It will be recalled that under the act of May 17, 1900, known as the free-homestead law, a provision was inserted to the effect that in case the receipts from the sale of public lands should be insufficient for the support of agricultural colleges in the several States and Territories, the deficiency should be provided directly from the Treasury. A like provision has been inserted in the pending measure.

Provision is also made for full and complete reports at the beginning of each session of Congress, such reports to give in detail all the facts relative to the question of the location of lands which can be irrigated and the cost of all contemplated works, and the cost of works in process of construction and those which have been completed.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not believe that it will be necessary to read the remainder of the report, as it is quite a lengthy document, which has been furnished by the Geological Survey. It goes into the question of irrigation quite extensively without touching upon the provisions of the bill.

I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to the part of the report pertaining to agricultural colleges, in which it is stated that we have inserted in the bill a provision similar to that in the free-homestead act, providing that if the receipts from the sales of public lands are not sufficient to meet the payments for agricultural colleges, then the payments shall be made out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. Please read that provision.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The report reads as follows:

It will be recalled that under the act——

Mr. COCKRELL. But the bill itself. Read the clause which makes that provision.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It is the proviso in section 1, and is as follows:

Provided, That in case the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands other than those realized from the sale and disposal of lands referred to in this section are insufficient to meet the requirements for the support of agricultural colleges in the several States and Territories, under the act of August 30, 1890, entitled "An act to apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to the more complete endowment and support of the colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, established under the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862," the deficiency, if any, in the sum necessary for the support of the said colleges shall be provided for from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. COCKRELL. Taking out the States which are named here, how mu h will be realized from the remaining public lands?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. About $600,000 last year.

Mr. COCKRELL. After excluding the States named herein?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. After excluding the States and Territories named in the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill authorizes the taking of not less than 40 nor more than 160 acres of land. I wish to know how much land a family can properly cultivate by irrigation? Would it be possible for any family to take up and utilize 160 acres and irrigate it all?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Oh, undoubtedly, if it is devoted to alfalfa and other kinds of hay or stock, and that is the principal product of irrigated lands in the West. Undoubtedly a family would occupy 160 acres and cultivate it all very easily.

Mr. COCKRELL. And irrigate it all?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. And irrigate it all.

Mr. TELLER. I will answer the Senator by saying that a great many farms of 160 acres, and a great many even larger, are cultivated where irrigation is the only way of cultivating it.

Mr. COCKRELL. But can a family do it?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. A man may hire labor and cultivate it?

Mr. TELLER. A good farmer with two or three boys—as many farmers have—can cultivate 160 acres just as well there as can be done in Illinois. It does require some extra work, of course, for two months to irrigate the land, but every farmer will manage to do that. I have known farmers to commence irrigating at 3 o'clock in the morning and keep at it all the day. They irrigate the crop only twice, as a rule, during the season, and it is not so very laborious.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. May I ask what was the amount of land which was set apart by Brigham Young for a family in Utah when he introduced irrigation?

Mr. TELLER. I am not able to answer that question. He had so large a family, I do not know that that is material to the bill before the Senate.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No; but I had the impression that the land which he set apart for a family was 22 acres, or something like that quantity.

Mr. STEWART. It was 20 acres in the beginning of the settlement. They had to raise all sorts of crops to support themselves. They were not raising alfalfa alone, as far as raising cattle was concerned, but they were not in the cattle business further than raising stock which ran at large. They had a good range there. They raised all that a family required on 20 acres. He said they could do better than they did with a larger amount of land.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. They made very great progress on those small holdings.

Mr. STEWART. They made progress, but afterwards they acquired larger holdings. A good many of the Mormons have quite large tracts of land now. They are cultivating land on a larger scale, and this is particularly the case where they are raising grain and alfalfa and stock. They can now cultivate a good deal of land, but they were then poor people, who had to support themselves. Each family had to raise all its supplies—bread, and meat, and vegetables. The land was cultivated by hand, and in that way it became a very prosperous community under those adverse circumstances.

Mr. CULLOM. May I ask the Senator from Nevada a question?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I see the bill provides that all moneys received from the sale and disposal of public lands in Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming shall be disposed of, as I suppose, for irrigation purposes. Has the Senator any idea as to how much public land will be included in all the States and Territories which have been named?

Mr. STEWART. Not accurately. There are, I think, about 600,000,000 acres of vacant land, but a very small part of that will be sold in small quantities. A great deal of it consists in mountain ranges and waste land. It is not waste land, but it could not be irrigated.

Mr. CULLOM. Has the Senator any idea how much public land is left in this country, without going to the Philippines, after this is set aside?

Mr. STEWART. I suppose if it is all sold and applied to this purpose it will reclaim from 75,000,000 to 100,000,000 acres of land. It will do more than that. It will utilize for grazing purposes the hills that are too far from water now to be used. It will make a new base of supplies for water. There are many places where water is so far distant that the land can not be used even for grazing purposes. This will make a new base of supply for water, and it will make the grazing lands that will be left and that can not be irrigated much more valuable.

Mr. CULLOM. How many acres of land does the Senator estimate will be reclaimed?

Mr. STEWART. There are probably 75,000,000 or 100,000,000 acres that can be reclaimed. Perhaps the Senator from North Dakota can figure it more accurately.

Mr. CULLOM. What I want to get at is how much we will pay for this irrigation and how much we are going to get back for the benefit of the country in reclaimed land.

Mr. STEWART. That I can answer in a vague way.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to know about that.

Mr. STEWART. If you get such a population as that country is susceptible of sustaining you will get back some very large States; you will get back a great deal of wealth; you will add vastly to the wealth and power of this country. At least two-fifths of the area of the United States needs irrigation in order to produce good crops, and when that is done, wherever you have had irrigation you can raise much more than you can on a like amount of land in the most fertile part of the United States, because you can calculate on an excellent crop each year on irrigated land, and in the southern portions of the country you can calculate on two crops. It does not take the same amount of land in irrigated countries to sustain a population that is required in a country where there is rainfall.

Now, government aid for irrigation is not a new thing. It has been carried on for the last thirty years in India on a very large scale. Hundreds of millions have been expended there to very great advantage. The irrigation of ancient times was carried on by government. It is nearly all beyond the reach of private individuals. Egypt was once the greatest granary of the world. A large part of the Sahara Desert was once a portion of that granary. They had an immense population. Recent excavations along the Nile have disclosed the ancient masonry of their aqueducts that surpassed in quality anything that can now be done. The Geographical Society of London spent a large amount of money to continue the excavation. Then, in looking over the Greek authorities we have found a description of the aqueducts that once turned the water on the Sahara Desert, and they dated their construction two thousand years previous to that time.

All of the early countries of which we have any history lived by irrigation. They first went on the desert, and it was only in comparatively recent times that civilized men cultivated lands relying on rainfall. Northern Europe remained until the last one thousand or fifteen hundred years comparatively a savage country. Civilization had not extended there. It was around the Mediterranean and the desert of Western Asia and in Africa, in those warm countries where they could irrigate the land, and there the population existed which formed the history of the world.

If we could estimate it, I should not be surprised to learn that three-fifths at least—it may be four-fifths—of the human race have subsisted on agriculture procured by irrigation. Latterly they have gone into the rainfall country and utilized the land there, and many of the desert countries have been abandoned. In Babylon and all through there where vast empires and dense population existed the remains of the system of irrigation are found.

I do not suppose that there is any part of the world's surface that is more healthful, more promising, and better calculated to produce habitations for men, and vigorous men, than the two-fifths of the United States which depends, and must depend, on irrigation to prosecute agriculture. It will benefit the country and increase our exports vastly. It will supply the people with food. It will supply them with homes and allow the growth of the country to go on.

We do many things to promote the general good, to promote commerce. We spend a vast amount of money to improve rivers and harbors. What good does it do? How do you get it back? You get it back in your increased commerce. You get it back in increased employment. You get it back in the increased wealth of the country. Here is a vast store of wealth, almost incomprehensible if irrigation can be carried on. It can not be carried on further by private enterprise to any great extent. Private enterprise has already diverted the waters where it can be easily done. It has diverted the water along the streams, but if this scheme is to be prosecuted there must be governmental aid, as has been given by other countries. We must have the water stored.

Again, if the water could be stored many other useful purposes could be gained. I do not want to say it in an offensive way, but you have gone on under the pretext of improving the navigation of the Mississippi River. Everyone knows that the appropriations do not help the navigation any. That is not what is wanted. It is to prevent the flooding of the land. It is to aid the farmer. It is to aid the development of that country. In your last river and harbor bill you appropriated $10,000,000 for that purpose, and very properly too, because here are vast States that would be ruined without it. I have no doubt that the purpose aimed at would be better secured by building reservoirs in the mountains and making lakes there. It is only a few inches of the water at the top that comes down and makes the high floods. If that can be kept back there will be only ordinary floods. High banks would not be necessary.

As it is now you have to build the banks higher and higher, and we do not know what may happen. Disaster may ultimately overtake us if we get the banks so high that they would break and drown the population, as is the case in China. They build up the banks there until the population is decimated sometimes by a single flood; millions of people lose their lives.

Make lakes in the mountains. Have great dams up there, where you can build reservoirs. If you spent $10,000,000 on the headwaters of the Missouri and made lakes there to keep back the flood waters you would accomplish more in preserving the farms below than all your expenditures along that line. There is no doubt about it. Engineers who have examined it will tell you so. I have talked with many who have investigated it, and they all came to that conclusion.

There are abundant valleys in the mountains high up. They are not useful for much else, but they will make fine lakes and keep back the water. Then the water can be drawn off and it will reclaim a vast amount of land on the foothills of the Rocky Mountains extending to within 100 miles of the Missouri River.

Half of Nebraska and more than half of Kansas need irrigation. Their value would be more than doubled if they had it, and if the water was stored and kept back there would be an abundant supply for the purpose.

This is a great proposition, and I hope that the bill will pass. It may not be perfect. It may not be the best thing to do, but it will be a start. The revenues may not be very great at first, but they will be sufficient. It will probably be best that it should not produce a larger amount of money than can be used at first. But I have no doubt that if the bill is passed it will be a step that will lead on to vast results. Our exports in the last six years have exceeded our imports by three thousand millions. If we had this two-fifths more of good agricultural country brought in we could increase the exports by 10 per cent, and the agricultural area of the country would be increased to that extent. If we could do that by this legislation it would add immensely to our other resources.

Then, besides, this arid country is not valuable for agriculture alone. In this region there are minerals of all descriptions—coal, iron, lead, copper, gold, and silver, and all that. If it were inhabited it would increase the product of your mines vastly, because it would give supplies to the mines and mining could be done more cheaply. Each industry will help the other, and you will build up great States. I do not think there is anyone who would regret that the State of Colorado should be equal in population to Illinois. It is capable of being so. Neither do I think that anyone would regret that Wyoming should be equal to Indiana. I think it has the resources to obtain that end.

As much as has been said against Nevada, that State may at some time be heard from. It has many beautiful valleys. They are situated at a distance from transportation now, but there is nothing more beautiful than many of the valleys of Nevada, nor more productive. There are many of them, and in the aggregate they constitute a large area. I am happy to be able to state that within the last year there has been the discovery of mines all over the State, particularly in Nye County. The discoveries at Tonopah and Ray, in Nye County, promise to surpass any discoveries in the last three years anywhere.

Mr. HOAR. Gold?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, gold. We do not despise gold. We are willing that money should be printed on gold. We are not ignorant at all of the fact that money can be printed on gold as well as silver or paper. We do not believe that the intrinsic quality of our money determines the amount exactly. We do not agree with the intrinsic theory, but we believe that we need more money, and we are getting it there.

I suppose my friend from Massachusetts would think that it is legislation that has made good times in the last six years. Legislation may have had something to do with it, but there have been $1,400,000,000 or $1,500,000,000 of new gold produced. That has supplied the demand. We simply needed more money and we have it now. I am sorry that some of my friends who contended that the country needed more money, and contended with me that we must have silver in order to get more money, did not recognize that the output of the world had determined otherwise, instead of relying on the law to create money. We thought it was useless to destroy one of them. It produced falling prices for twenty years. We have not gotten over that yet, but we were not so foolish as to hang on to that issue after the progress of the country had taken it away from us.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I would have the Senator know that I had no ulterior purpose or purpose of sarcasm or in suggesting anything except I did not hear what the Senator said. He said they had discovered mines that were among the best in the world, and I simply asked, "Of gold?" I can see how the Senator might have supposed I made a jest.

Mr. STEWART. I accept the apology.

Mr. HOAR. I did not make any apology. I make the statement of fact. I had no such purpose.

Mr. STEWART. I had no idea but the Senator had the best purpose, as he always has.

Mr. HOAR. I had no purpose of suggesting what the Senator just said in reply, but I did not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. STEWART. I said that we discovered in Nevada in the last year mines that promised to exceed any discoveries in the last twenty years in any country. The prospects are better. Take, for example, Tonopah. It was discovered not a year ago—about ten months ago—and it was leased and given to a number of men who had windlasses worked by hand. Then it was sold to a company in Philadelphia for $350,000. The lessees ran it until the 1st of last January, and they have taken out, it is estimated, over $7,000,000 just in one little place. During that time they have extended the discoveries for some 15 or 20 miles. It is an immense mineral belt. It is both silver and gold. I did not mention silver for the purpose of raising the silver question at this time, but we have to take it along with the others.

I did not rise for the purpose of making a speech, for I do not want to delay the passage of this bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I merely wish to say that I made the inquiry simply for information, knowing that the Senator could give it, and without any purpose of opposing the bill.

Mr. STEWART. I hope not.

Mr. CULLOM. I am ready to vote on the question.

Mr. CARMACK. I should like to ask the Senator a question before he sits down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. I wish to ask the Senator if any estimate has ever been made of the population that could be sustained on the land not now subject to cultivation if it could be irrigated?

Mr. STEWART. I do not think any estimate has been made. Probably no accurate estimate can be made. But if you bring under cultivation the fertile lands that may be cultivated by irrigation in this very healthful climate—the best climate in the world—together with the mineral resources and everything which goes to make a great and populous country, by the use of agricultural lands in connection with the other advantages, I think the population might be increased many millions—perhaps twenty, thirty, or even forty millions. Nobody can tell how many people could live there. We know it is true that in desert countries which had been irrigated the population was more dense than anywhere else. We have all the evidence that it will be the same in that region.

There is nothing to destroy human life there. There is no malaria, no damp climate, nor anything that tends to shorten human life. In that high altitude, with the advantages of health and vigor and with the abundant resources of the country, agricultural and mineral, we have reason to believe, and I have no doubt, that the population will increase very largely. You can not tell how much, of course, but in the near future if this scheme of irrigation is adopted the increase will be very great.

I believe, from the tone of the press, that the people of the East are waking up to the importance of the accomplishment of these great results. They are not biased or sectional when they talk about it. That feeling does not exist. They are willing to take hold anywhere, as is shown by their history, for the purpose of aiding in these enterprises which not only increase wealth, but increase population and increase the grandeur and power of this Republic. I think that is the universal sentiment. I believe that legislation in this direction will do very much to accomplish the object that we all desire to attain.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have watched every item of expenditure for rivers and harbors. It is pretty well understood that very many improvements on rivers at least are largely useless. The railroads have practically supplanted water transportation. There are numberless instances in which we have spent and are spending millions of dollars to secure something that is never used. Therefore when the people in the West come forward here and ask Congress to give them consideration by beginning a scheme of internal improvement looking largely to enabling those States to obtain citizens, I must confess it appeals to me as a practical statesmanlike method of spending money and one far more worthy of consideration and respect than some of the expenditures for rivers, for instance.

Of course, our large harbors, where the commerce of the world coming across the ocean enters, have been improved, and need to be improved, and such improvements are very valuable; but, as compared with the expenditures for rivers, I think this project merits very careful consideration and encouragement. I believe the Western people, and the people in the States which we consider as arid, and which are sparsely populated and will remain so, are right in coming here and asking the attention and assistance of Congress to the absolute necessity of the National Government taking some steps looking to their betterment or to enabling them to get people. Private citizens can not go into a desert and enter into the large enterprises of building reservoirs and cutting canals in order to put water on land. We in the East, who get our water from the Almighty by reason of our climatic conditions, do not sympathize with those people as we should. We are getting too much water in some parts of the country, as we see by the telegraphic dispatches that inundations and devastations of certain areas in our different States are threatened.

The only thing which I see in this proposition that probably is strange is that instead of coming directly to the Treasury and asking a specific appropriation for annual improvement along this line, as we are making continuing contracts for improving rivers and harbors, we come here and merely limit these people to a fund that is somewhat nebulous and will certainly prove inadequate. I think the people of the East—and I live in a State in the East where we get plenty of rain ordinarily—should go at this in a broader and more statesmanlike way, and instead of using the money that is to be derived from these sales, which, as I said, will be uncertain in amount, and the amount is going to be inadequate, we should go at it by a direct appropriation.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to state to the Senator that the friends of irrigation have been before Congress repeatedly asking for a direct appropriation.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, I understand that. I have in mind a remarkable instance of the way in which a river and harbor bill for the East and for the South and for the Pacific slope was done to death here last year by a man from the sagebrush country, who felt outraged that the just demands of that great interior plateau were ignored. I sympathized with him, and I was rather amused, although I lost some beef in that pot.

I am only expressing these views here by reason of the fact that there are in the South large areas not of public land, but land that is practically worthless, which has too much water. If we could divide it out and give your people our surplus, then you would have all the water you need and we could work the land by getting rid of the excessive quantity of water with which we are distressed, which practically bars us from cultivating those areas.

I would much prefer, as a practical man desiring to get value received for money I vote here, to enter upon a scheme of internal improvements that would really be of some use instead of spending $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 to first dredge out a canal and then pump water into it, as our friend Carter said last winter was being done in some places.

Mr. BERRY. Which statement was not true.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, not altogether true, but still it was so far in the direction of truth that I am afraid my friend will get into the trouble I was in recently if he does not be more parliamentary. [Laughter.]

But I say, instead of doing those things or even doing anything approximating them, it would appear to me to be wiser to have schemes of internal improvement meet the conscientious approval of the men charged with spending the public money instead of entering into a combination, as you might call it, by which the different sections interested would go on the old doctrine of "you tickle me and I will tickle you." "You let my job through and I will let your job through." I honestly declare it my belief that as legislators, charged with the expenditure of public taxes, we have been derelict, and will continue to be derelict until we quit throwing money into rivers that will never have a boat on them, and put it into such schemes as will relieve the Southern States of the excess of water in some of their swamps which can not now be cultivated or used or sold by reason of the fact that they need canals to let the water run away, and in this other plan of reserving or preserving or erecting reservoirs to retain the little water that God lets drop there for use upon land that would be rendered valuable if they could get water for farming purposes.

I see very clearly that after this scheme begins, or has been commenced, rather, for a scheme does not begin of itself, the money will be so inadequate that our friends from the sagebrush States, as one of our distinguished statesmen once called them—I believe he said they were very good as Territories but very undesirable as States—will come to us in a year or two, or five or six years, and say, "We have done nothing; we can not accomplish anything; we have not got money enough." I will be prepared, if I am here at that time, to say, "That is very true; and I believe you ought to have it by a direct appropriation instead of wasting it in this other way."

I may in time ask them to help us get rid of some of the water that we have by digging canals there upon some conditions of improvement to the interest of private parties by having them pay a percentage. I believe we have an arrangement here by which those who already own lands which will be improved by these canals shall pay some percentage or make some return to the Government, have we not?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. TILLMAN. Let me finish my sentence.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I say I may in time, not in a logrolling scheme, but in an honest effort to do something in behalf of an honest expenditure of money, or rather an expenditure—it is unparliamentary to say any expenditure here is not honest, because all acts of Congress are supposed to be passed for the public welfare, and I withdraw that [laughter]—but I think that the time will come when we of the South and the West, which could not unite on silver—at least the marriage bonds were divorced very soon, as we have seen our friend here bragging about gold—will have to join forces in endeavoring to secure drainage for the swamps of the South and a proper expenditure of money for irrigation in the West.

Mr. HANSBROUGH and Mr. STEWART addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. STEWART. Let me suggest——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has recognized the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. STEWART. I simply want to say——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I was the first to break in on the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to say that we were divorced not by law, but by the death of the issue.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Very well. I simply wanted to remark that it is not the purpose of the framers of this bill and the friends of irrigation to come back to Congress for more money.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I am not insinuating that it is the purpose now. I am merely expressing my opinion that the time will come when he will be compelled to come to Congress for more money out of the general fund, and not depend on this source. As I understand the situation, the sales of public lands within given areas now are small, and the amount received is pitiable and contemptible compared with the immense amount that would be necessary for this purpose. In other words, you will have to repair your irrigation canals, and then if you are going to sell that land, instead of opening it up to homestead, you would have to fix a price that would be so high that the average poor man could not buy it. I do not see how the scheme is going to effect any practical results with the amount of money you will have coming into your reclamation fund by this bill.

I absolve the Senator and his colleagues of any such purpose whatever, because I know they are very modest in their desires now, because they have been shut out in the cold so long that they are really only anxious to begin to get the wedge in, to get the nose of the camel into the tent, but they will get the whole body in after a while, and I think they ought to get it in.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Now I hope the Senator will allow me to proceed.

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. What I have been trying to say, Mr. President, is that the purpose of this bill is to open up certain areas in the Western country to settlement under the homestead laws. There are provisions in the bill under which entrymen will pay the full amount of the cost of all the irrigation works. So this is intended at least to be a self-sustaining proposition. Those who have studied it believe that in the course of ten or twelve or fifteen years the amount of money derived from the sale of public lands under the operation of the bill will be much greater than it has ever been in the history of the country and that we shall get enough money out of the sale of public lands to go on and ultimately irrigate the arid West.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the pending bill. I was on the committee which reported it, but I did not vote to report it, and I do not expect to vote for it in the Senate. As I said, I do not intend to discuss it.

I should not have risen except that I did not want the statement made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] in regard to rivers and harbors and the practice with reference to them to go without being challenged. In my judgment there is no money expended by this Government that has done so much good for so many people as the money that is expended for rivers and harbors. I want to say, furthermore, that in many sections of the country the improvement of rivers is the only restraint that we have on exorbitant charges by railroads, and in that way those improvements have been of immense benefit to every section of the country.

In addition to this, I wish to say that I do not agree with the Senator's idea that the improvement of great harbors is of more importance than the river improvements. I believe that the people living along those rivers are entitled to the same rights and the same protection as the States which lie along the coast of the Atlantic or the Pacific; and that the amount of money that is given to them they are as much entitled to and it is as much to their benefit as in the case of any of the great seacoast towns in proportion to the amount that is expended. The benefit is not as great, because the population is not as great; but I repeat, that in proportion to the amount that is expended upon those rivers, there is as much benefit to a proportionate number of people as the amount expended for the harbors or for any of the other great works of the country.

I have heard it stated again and again that appropriations have been made for rivers which were useless, and extreme expressions have been used in regard to them. I do not think that a river and harbor bill, either the last one which was defeated or any other bill which has been reported since I have been here, is justly subject to any such criticism. There may be individual instances in this great country and in these great appropriations where all the benefits hoped for do not come. That I admit. But when Senators speak about the little creeks that are being improved without any benefit, I notice that they always select those creeks in some other State besides the one in which they live. My recollection now is—I say it all in good humor—that when the last river and harbor bill was pending in the Senate, I do not remember any Senator on this floor who was more insistent and urgent for an appropriation than the Senator from South Carolina for the Pedee River, I think it was, down in South Carolina, and for many more of them which he got into the bill.

I say this in good humor. I have sat on this floor, and especially at the close of the last Congress, when I and the other members of the Committee on Commerce had no opportunity to reply in regard to these statements about the rivers and harbors. It is unjust to the committee; it is unjust to Congress, and I repeat that no bill is more carefully examined and more earnestly looked after than the river and harbor bill. While there may be a few instances where appropriations should not be made—and I admit that there have been such instances—it has never been done by logrolling. There has never been any proposition since I have been a member of that committee, nor do I think that the chairman or any other member of the committee would submit to any proposition, which looked like logrolling in regard to this matter. I believe the river and harbor bill to be one of the most important bills and of more benefit to this country than any other measure.

I thought I ought to make this statement. Otherwise the statement which was made is calculated, as I think, if believed by a majority of the Senate, to do immense injury to the people of the Southern States, from one of which I come.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I thought almost everyone here understood that my remarks were in a large part humorous. I had no purpose or intention of reflecting in the slightest upon the Committee on Commerce or its chairman or to cast any stone whatever at them. I believe they have done their full duty as they saw it as public servants, and that they have only earned the gratitude of the country by resisting the importunities of men like myself who have gone to that committee to get their share, as they claimed, or thought they ought to get it. I do not believe that the committee has ever logrolled or allowed anybody else to logroll.

But neither the Senator from Arkansas nor any other Senator on that committee—I do not happen to be on it—will deny that they are importuned and begged almost beyond endurance by different men from different States trying to get this project in and that project in and the other project in, many of which we all know are only designed to curb the railroads. We could curb the railroads in another way. It is not necessary that we shall spend ten, twenty, fifty, or one hundred million dollars in improving rivers which are nearly dry and upon which no steamboat ever travels after they are improved in order to enable cities to receive competitive water rates. It is the use of the rivers after they are improved and made available for the transportation of freight that I speak of. We all know that the steamers on our inland rivers are practically confined to a very small percentage of our tonnage and that the amount of commerce they carry is very small.

Take the Mississippi, for instance. There is your great inland sea with its thousands of miles of water transportation. It enables the cities on its banks and on the banks of its tributaries to obtain from the railroads a concession, and is there as a perpetual menace to monopoly and to rates of transportation which would practically put those people at the mercy of the railroads. But Congress can protect those cities by making the railroads give reasonable and proper rates in another way; and if we neglect our duty in one direction by refusing to give the Interstate Commerce Commission proper power or due power to fix rates that are just and reasonable and bar them out from being anything in the way of assistance to the country, it is not an excuse for spending millions of dollars on rivers that are never used and never will be used.

This is a practical proposition. The Southern people need assistance and help; and I am sure I am not going to go back on my own country, because I have just proposed a practical expenditure of money that will be of real benefit to us—that we should dig some canals there and get rid of the surplus water rather than dig out rivers that are never used after we dredge them or after we put in the improvements which would deepen them.

There is the Savannah River, for instance, which runs between Georgia and South Carolina. It has had hundreds of thousands of dollars spent on it, and there is not a steamer that runs on it from Augusta to Savannah. It only gives the city of Augusta transportation by competitive water rates, and the railroads——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will permit me to say that while he lives very near to Augusta, nearer than I do, perhaps, I am quite sure he is mistaken in the breadth of that statement.

Mr. TILLMAN. The observation may be a little broad. They do run up some boats from Savannah to reach regions in the interior which are a considerable distance from railroads; but I am speaking of the commerce of the city of Augusta. It comes to the city in railroad cars, and the water transportation between Augusta and the Atlantic Ocean is practically nothing—I mean the amount of freight carried. I am only illustrating.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, I am going to help you get any money for any Georgia river you can, and I am going to ask you to help me to get some for the little creeks and hollows and wallows down in my State when a new river and harbor bill comes up.

I am afraid I have put myself in bad odor with one member of that committee; but I want to apologize and withdraw any insinuations that he could be induced by any possible means to let a scheme pass which did not commend itself to his judgment as being a worthy one. I know there is no member of that committee (and I know all of them) who would lend himself to any jobbery there. I am only speaking about the general proposition and the policy of the Senate in sitting here and doing nothing to make the railroads give reasonable rates while they turn around and spend an immense amount of money to make the railroads give reasonable rates. Why should we go about making railroads do justice to the country and be reasonable in their charges in this way, by spending ten or twenty million dollars or such a matter as that every year to dig out creeks and rivers that are never used? That is the proposition, and it is a matter of practical business to which I ask the attention of Senators.

My few remarks have been made at random. I had not been thinking about this subject at all. I just happened in here when the matter was being discussed, and as I had been rather—well——

Mr. BERRY. Closed up.

Mr. TILLMAN. Closed up. I had been in a condition of innocuous desuetude for some days and I thought you might want to hear from me again. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I shall not follow the Senator in this discussion, but I want to say this, that the Savannah River of which he speaks and has used as an illustration is not of the class described by him. It is——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator to pardon me for a moment. It is true that the large bulk of the commerce of Augusta is carried by rail, but it is also true that if the occasion demanded it all of the commerce could be carried on the river, and there are boats constantly running on the river which do carry a portion of that commerce.

It so happened at one time, when the railroads were destroyed, immediately after the civil war, and when there was no interior communication by means of rail from the seaboard westward, that the entire commerce of the State of Georgia north of the middle line went up the Savannah River by boat, and was distributed from Augusta. The river since then has been very largely improved, and the fact that there is little commerce upon it is not due to the allegation of the Senator that it is of this inferior class, but simply because it is more convenient to use the railroads. Nevertheless it is a very important river, capable of an important function.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, lest my own constituents who live along the banks of that stream might imagine that I have been casting reflections or throwing stones at the Savannah River, I want to tell the Senator from Georgia that I know very well that it is a very large stream. It is some 500 miles long, and from Augusta to Savannah, some 250 miles by water, it is capable of being navigated by boats, the draft of which I do not know, but I know it is capable of furnishing an outlet for a large commerce. I was only speaking of that as an illustration of the fact that after we improve these streams—and we have improved them only in order to curb the rapacity of railroads—they are not used except as a lever to force the railroads to give competitive water rates, and I contend that we could give the cities competitive water rates, even where they are not on water, if we would extend the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission and enable it to judge what is proper for the railroads to charge for traffic.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wanted at some time while the bill was pending to say a sentence or two about it, independent of the other question which has been lately discussed.

I should like to say a few words in regard to the suggestion that water communication is of little importance compared with the railroads, especially if they are subject to the power of regulation. Somehow or other the great cities and towns are still on the waterways. There is no indication that that great law of human habitation and business has yet lost its efficiency. There are some important exceptions. The town wherein I dwell is one where we have a city 125,000 inhabitants, which has grown up as if it were a Western city, without any water; but in general, the city is planted and always has been planted and always will be planted where there is water for purposes of commerce.

Now, it is true that the comparative and I do not know but it is true that the absolute use of the river has diminished and that the railroad has taken its place. I suppose there are several bridges across the Mississippi River, each one of which carries more freight than the whole river carries; but it is a natural, perfect, and irresistible check upon the railroads, not the creation of human laws and not subject to the imperfection in working of human laws.

Until a very recent time, when the communication by the lakes and the canals from the West to the Atlantic froze up, the railroad rates advanced, and in the spring, when the lakes and the harbors and the waterways thawed out, down went the railroad rates. It commenced with the most northerly of the lines, and later on the New York Central, and then the Pennsylvania, and then the Baltimore and Ohio, and so on. I do not believe it would be possible, in the nature of things, but for that limit upon railroad rates to-day, that any human legislative power could make the railroads charge what would be regarded by the great part of the mercantile and commercial public as reasonable rates.

There are great powers in legislation, but you have never yet succeeded in having a permanent, sure, and absolute regulation of the great imperial powers of capital by legislative enactment. It is a clumsy, imperfect instrument. You can not in two legislative bodies have a fair and reasonable consideration of proper railroad rates either for short distances or for long distances. That great power can never be safely intrusted to a single commission. So I think the policy of improving our waterways and having them as a final resource of commerce, always open and always ready, ought to be continued.

I should like to say one word about this talk as to logrolling, which I have heard ever since I have known anything about such things. We see it repeated in the papers, in essays in magazines, and hear it in both of the legislative Chambers. It is said that one State gets what it needs or what it wants by a bargain with some other State that it shall have what it wants.

Mr. President, in my humble opinion, having studied this matter as carefully as I have studied any subject, there is not the slightest foundation for that charge. The fact is that the Corps of Engineers, an impartial body of purely scientific men, not representing and not very thoroughly understanding mere commercial problems, report to us that the necessities of foreign and interstate commerce demand large appropriations, and the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, and the corresponding committee of the other branch, find they can not annually expend more than a fifth or a tenth of the amount which could be profitably expended for those purposes if we had unlimited revenues at our command, and in general they deny five projects where they grant one.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Or cut down the amounts.

Mr. HOAR. Or largely cut down the amount, as my friend the Senator from Connecticut suggests, and spread over ten years a work which ought to be accomplished in one or two.

Now, under those circumstances it is perfectly reasonable and proper and just that what is done should not be done in one State or section, but should be apportioned in different parts of the country. Suppose you have a city in New Jersey, Mr. President [Mr. KEAN in the chair], where there are three wards, making different populations and communities, as we have a city in Massachusetts, like the city of Cambridge, and you have to build twelve new schoolhouses by reason of the loss of the old ones, or some sudden growth or some change in the proper scheme of construction, and you could not in any one year build but three. Would anybody call it logrolling to have those three wards insist that those three schoolhouses should be divided equally among the different parts of the town?

Now, that is all the logrolling there is in general, and in the nature of things there can not be any considerable amount of fraudulent or extravagant or unreasonable scheming got into a river and harbor bill. Why not? Because every time you put an unjust or an unreasonable scheme into that bill you have to deny some reasonable and just demand which has been indorsed by the Corps of Engineers. Therefore you make, as an enemy of your proposition, and ready to denounce you when you put in such an item, every one of a hundred honest projects which some Senator or Representative has at heart, and you make every honest project in the country the opponent of your measure and standing ready to condemn you.

Now, we had a very interesting example of that in the famous river and harbor bill of 1883, which was vetoed by President Arthur. It amounted in all to $18,000,000, and of that sum $12,000,000, I think, was for the improvement of the Mississippi River. It was eleven or twelve million dollars; I do no know but $13,000,000. The Senator from Maine can correct me, but it is not important. It was for a project which the President had, by a special message, urged upon the favorable consideration of Congress. So the general river and harbor bill amounted to only five or six million dollars, and the Senate voted to sustain that expenditure of five or six millions, over the President's veto, and there went a storm of foolish and ridiculous popular excitement over the whole country on account of the five or six million dollars expenditure. The President in his veto message, talking about logrolling, said that the effect of logrolling was that the more improper and corrupt the scheme the more votes it got.

At the next session of Congress one House or the other asked the War Department to specify of that five or six million dollars the items which the President thought were not fairly warranted by the exigencies of interstate or international commerce, and the Secretary of War replied, stating either in his reply or afterwards, at least publicly, that his statement was made by direction of the President; and out of that entire bill against which that charge had been made there was, all told, somewhat less than $100,000, if I recollect aright, of measures which were alleged by the Executive who vetoed the bill to be unreasonable and improper or extravagant. And on that this wretched cry of logrolling and corruption in that case had sufficed, encouraged by the press and encouraged by some voices in one or the other Houses of Congress, to drive nearly a third of the members of the House of Representatives, I think, from their seats.

My own State had no interest in that river and harbor bill. Her demands were the demands of a great ocean port. When Boston or New York harbor asks for an improvement, it is an improvement which is to get an obstacle out of the way of the products which go to Europe from the great tier of States from New England to Washington, and which obstructs what they are to receive as well as what they are to sell. So nobody seriously and permanently resists our demands. These local improvements, which in the aggregate are as important, do not especially concern us; but of course the great Atlantic ports like Galveston, or Savannah, or Charleston, or New York, or Philadelphia do concern us, because every coastwise voyage which has Boston for one end has one of those ports for the other.

We have no special interest in the matter of irrigation, but as Americans we have in it a vast interest. There is a great space on the earth's surface nearly waste and barren now, which by reasonable and moderate expenditure can be converted into a fertile and blooming garden and can blossom as the rose. I have no doubt there are on this continent lands largely useless now, on which under proper development and with proper human agencies ten and perhaps scores and perhaps hundreds of millions of human beings are within a century or less to be located in happy American homes, and I for one, as a New England man, as a Massachusetts man, and as a lover of my country, welcome the inauguration of the policy which is to bring that to pass.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I wish to add one word, not entering upon the discussion of the bill at length. As there has been some expression by Senators as to those who would support and those who would not support the bill, I desire to state that I have heretofore in the Senate given my support to measures of this kind, looking to the inauguration of this very important work. How far we can go in safety of course the future must determine as we progress, but as one who has several times crossed the great arid plains of the West and who has here and there seen the oasis which has sprung up where they have had through irrigation the advantage of water, I am most earnestly impressed with the fact that the proposition involves a great deal for this country.

While I do not concede what has in substance been said by my friend from South Carolina, that it is a question of reciprocal benefit between the States on the seaboard and those in the interior, a balancing of appropriations, as it were, it is true in a large measure that that is a consideration which, within reasonable limitations, should not be lost sight of. It is of the utmost importance that the rivers and harbors of this country should be properly improved, and there is a very large part of the country which can not get the benefit from such benefactions of the Government made to accomplish this end. States so situated contribute their part, and it is certainly, in my judgment, a proper thing for us at least to do that which they now ask, the undertaking of a sufficient enterprise in this matter to give the information by practical experiment, which shall be a guide to us in the future in determining how far we can proceed in this effort to reclaim this vast area of country.

Mr. President, I have a grand realization of the great work which can be devolved upon the American people in the development of our own resources within our own borders, and I desire above all things in this connection that our eyes shall be withdrawn from vain enterprises and undertakings outside of our sphere, and that our attention and our efforts and our resources may be devoted to the development and the building up of this great country which, when developed and when built up in its almost limitless proportions, will be so vast as compared to that which we now enjoy as to be difficult of realization. The reclamation of these arid lands will be almost like adding a new continent to our domain—a vast expanse opened for the employment of the energies and the activities of our people. With these lands reclaimed we will have a country capable of maintaining between the Atlantic and Pacific three or four hundred millions of people. The wealth which would be added to the nation is beyond calculation. Better that we spend our hundreds of millions of dollars in the creation of this new world within our borders than squander it beyond the seas.

Mr. President, on the subject of rivers and harbors, as in the discussion to-day we have somewhat mixed up these two questions, statements have been made here as to the great benefit to the country and the great importance to us of their development and improvement. We all of us are largely influenced in our views on these matters by the developments in our own localities, and I have in mind now my own State.

We have two principal seaports, Savannah and Brunswick, and it is a fact that without the appropriations which have been made by the United States for the development of those two harbors they would to-day be practically sealed to the commerce of the world.

The city of Savannah before the development of Galveston was the second cotton port in the United States. It is now, I believe, the third. It is now and has been for a number of years the largest naval-stores port in all the world—not simply in the United States, but in all the world. And yet if it were not for the appropriations made through the recommendations of our Commerce Committee and through those of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House, by which the Savannah River has been deepened, that commerce would to-day be dead, because it would be impossible for the great ships of the world to come into the harbor of Savannah to secure this vast commerce and distribute it over the world.

Take the case of Brunswick. By a fortuitous circumstance, which it is not necessary for me to describe, beginning in a small way, but gradually increasing, the bar of Brunswick became so formidable as to practically close the harbor and in effect wipe Brunswick off the map as a seaport. I think it had filled up to such an extent that ships drawing over 14 or 15 feet of water could not enter the harbor. It was approximately that; possibly a little more than that, but not much more. By the appropriations, it is true peculiar in their method in that particular instance, and I will not stop to describe them, but through the opportunities given by the appropriations of this Government, contingent appropriations in that case, there is now over 24 feet of water on the bar, and great ships of deep draft are enabled to enter the harbor of Brunswick and carry on the commerce by which, among other important articles of export, in large degree the yellow-pine lumber of the State of Georgia—and the product of Georgia is a very large part of all of it—is shipped from that port to all parts of the world.

I do not intend by anything I say to take issue with the proposition advanced that there are frequently cases, probably some in every bill, in which there are appropriations to impracticable streams that ought not to be made; but, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, comparatively they are very small in amount, and the great commerce of this country, not only the commerce of the seaports but of the sections of country which are tributary to the seaports, is dependent upon the fact that the United States Government does that which the States can not do. The States have not the money necessary for these great works. The United States Government enables by its appropriations the preservation and the development of these harbors to an extent which makes it practicable for the great commerce of the country, not only between its different ports but with all the world, to be carried on.

I do not know, Mr. President, to what extent the question of appropriation for the arid lands may ultimately be carried, but if it be true, as I understand it is, that a very large proportion of the benefit which is to come from this measure will be to lands which are now the property of the United States Government, and which will thus be increased in value to a very great extent, there is certainly still another reason, outside of those which have been mentioned this morning at least, why we should devote a liberal proportion of the revenues of the Government for that purpose.

I shall be more than gratified by the result, even if it does not for the present have any other effect than the single one I first mentioned. If we can withdraw our attention from that which I believe will not be of profit to us and center it upon that which will be of infinite profit and advantage to us in this immense area, awaiting our touch to wake it from sleep, it will be sufficient compensation in my mind for the appropriation which is asked. If we have millions to spare, either out of the sales of public lands or out of other funds, it is better that we devote the money to the improvement and the reclamation of our own country, limitless as it is in its promise and in its vast possibilities, than that we should squander it in distant lands among an alien people.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the friends of this bill do not regard it as a local measure. The application of the money will be local, it is true, but the land will be open to the people of all parts of the United States. It is almost certain that they will be occupied by persons who are not now residents of those States or Territories. A majority of the land, I have no doubt, will be absorbed by the people who do not now reside within the limits of the arid region. So we do not think it is local. The whole people of the United States are to be benefited in this particular, and we believe there will be a greater and more universal disposition of these benefits than could come from almost anything else the Government could do.

We people of the Northwest have had practically nothing of immediate benefit in the appropriations made for many years for rivers and harbors. We have had the general benefit, the good to the whole country, and that is all. Yet, Mr. President, I will venture to say that there has never been a river and harbor bill for twenty-five years that has not received practically the unanimous support of the representatives from the arid States. Of course there was an exception at the last session, where a Western Senator came in here and defeated the bill. That was an exception. Not only that, but all the appropriations for coast defenses and for improvements of that character for the protection of the country and for the creation of a navy to protect the Atlantic and Pacific cities of the country have always received practically the united support of the Northwest.

We do not appeal, however, to Senators to give to this measure support because we have done that, for that was only our duty, as we saw it, to the country at large. I merely wanted to impress upon the Senate that we are not asking for local benefit and local advantage, but a benefit and advantage that are open to every citizen of the United States in every part of it. We believe that the Government has never expended a dollar that will do as much good as the money that will be spent on these arid lands in the way of providing water for their cultivation.

In addition to that, Mr. President, the United States is a great landowner. The United States owns millions and millions of acres in these States which have been withdrawn from the taxing power of the State, and the State can never tax them unless we violate our compact with the General Government or they shall be capable of individual ownership. For that reason, if for no other, the General Government, it seems to me, ought to take some hand in this great work.

All we ask is that the Government shall do what most of the States, at least, are unable to do without great embarrassment to themselves; that the Government shall furnish the money and build the reservoirs and sell the land and attach the expense to the land, if they so desire, and thus get rid of the land that the Government can never sell unless it does take some such step, or unless the State should take such measures and do what we hope the Government will under this bill eventually do.

Now, Mr. President, as to the proposition that we are coming back here for more money. If we come back here for more money, it will be because we have demonstrated that this is a good method for the Government of the United States to expend its money. I am sure it ought not to be any objection if we should come back here ten years from now and say, and say it in a way that will convince our legislative bodies that "this work, so far as it has gone, has been a valuable work, and we ask you to increase it."

The Legislature of this nation is not likely to do that unless the Government gets an equivalent, either in the return of its money or, what is infinitely better, in the creation of communities of healthy American citizens on land of their own, which everybody knows makes the best community in the world, and the only safe community for a Republic like ours.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I represent in part a little State that has only 12 miles of seacoast, and hence gets little out of the appropriations for rivers and harbors; but, in common with the other representatives from New Hampshire in both Houses of Congress, we have voted always for appropriations for the development of our harbors and the rivers of the country. Our votes have always been recorded, as I recall it, in behalf of the so-called river and harbor bill.

On two or three former occasions, if I remember correctly, I have voted in favor of a direct appropriation from the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of starting an irrigation scheme in this country to reclaim the arid and semiarid regions of the West.

So, Mr. President, I am glad of an opportunity to say a word in behalf of this bill, which proposes to use the proceeds from the sale of public lands for irrigation purposes. I have held to the view heretofore that it was a proper scheme for the Government to engage in, and I shall be very happy indeed to record my vote in favor of the measure that is now under consideration.

Mr. President, even from a selfish standpoint, or from selfish considerations, I should give my vote in favor of this bill. We are engaged in New England largely in manufactures, and we are seeking new markets for our manufactured goods. I feel sure that every thoughtful New England man will agree that when the arid region of our country is reclaimed, and American families and American homes are established on these lands, it will open a new market for the manufactured goods of New England. Possibly our people have not to any very considerable extent considered that view of the subject, which to my mind would be a controlling reason, if I had no other reason, for voting for the bill that is now before the Senate.

I do not wish, Mr. President, to delay the vote on this bill. As I understand, no serious opposition has yet developed against it, and I will content myself with the simple further declaration that it is to me a pleasure to be permitted to vote for a bill that the Senators representing the great Western States have agreed upon, and that I think it so safeguarded that it will do no harm to any section of our country, and which can not fail to result in the greatest possible advantage to the people of the United States.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, the people out in our section of the country have no particular interest, directly I mean, in rivers and harbors. It is gratifying, however, to discover that when the river and harbor question is broached there is harmony from one side of this Chamber to the other, and those of us who live in the arid West will not disturb that harmony, for I feel that for the high purposes the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] expressed, there is not one of us, recognizing the tremendous benefits of free and unimpeded navigation in the rivers of the country, but will vote for any well-considered and properly constructed river and harbor bill.

There was one time when I thought that Colorado would be directly interested in the river and harbor bill. It was a great many years ago, twenty-eight years ago, I believe, when I first went to Denver. Private enterprise had constructed a canal about 2 miles long, from some lakes in the neighborhood of Denver to the boundaries of the city, and then private enterprise constructed a steamer about 60 feet long, a stern-wheeler, and they put upon it an engine that had been used in the running of a thrashing machine. It was small, but it was perfectly marvelous to see the crowds that wended their way to this new naval enterprise upon the part of some folks in our city to take advantage of a ride on the turbid waters of the canal. I think that upon Sundays no less than four or five thousand people would pay their 25 cents to get upon that miniature steamer and, with the man at the bow with a long pole to keep its nose from running into the banks upon either side, ride to the lakes and return.

It was about that time, Mr. President, that Congress passed an act making Denver a port of entry. So you can see that with the two enterprises we had reason to hope that at some future day Denver would rival perhaps Chicago, or Savannah, or Galveston, or New Orleans as a real Simon Pure port of entry. But a storm came, the banks were washed away, and the hopes of all Colorado vanished.

It is time to leave that subject, if I will reach the bill at all, to suggest a few thoughts that are in my mind with reference to this particular measure. To my mind, a bill of this kind is a great pacificator. It is a great civilizer. Any measure that in a legitimate way will furnish an outlet from the great congested cities of the country to the agricultural regions is of a vast substantial benefit to the country from a social and an economic standpoint.

In the early days before I had given particular thought to subjects of this kind I used to hear men discuss the tremendous benefits that the boundless West conferred upon the country. When hard times came, when great manufacturing industries shut down, when great numbers of people were idle and there was danger of great social disturbances in the great cities, instead of meeting for the purpose of concocting trouble, attracted by the possibility or the certainty of a home in the West, they would manage to buy a wagon and a team; they would load their family and their household goods upon the wagon, and they would tread out to the West. The great West relieved the great cities of their superabundance of population.

One of the greatest evils that threatens this country to-day, in my opinion, Mr. President, is that by reason of the absorption of the inhabited and cultivable portion of the public lands this outlet to the surplus population of the great cities is just about closed. I have been impressed with this view of the question, that the addition of a new county of agricultural lands to this country is better than a regiment of soldiers for the purpose of preserving the peace. The addition of a new State, practically uninhabited, is better than a standing army. I am inclined to believe that one reason why this country got along for nearly a century with the small standing army that met its wants was the fact that the great West was open to the surplus of the population of the great cities, and the idle were not forced to meet, either in secret or in public, for the purpose of devising new and devious ways to secure for themselves and their families a livelihood.

The danger to this country is going to come, Mr. President, when the homes in the country are foreclosed to the people, when the tendency will be toward the centers of civilization, and there will be no room on the outskirts. I do not desire to enlarge upon that thought.

There are, say, 75,000,000 or 100,000,000 acres of agricultural lands that to-day can not be used, that do not supply any inducement to those who live in cities; that, so far as they are concerned, form a terra incognita. If these lands, by any reasonable process, can be transformed into lands in which and over which and through which the plow may be dragged with profit, from which bountiful crops may be harvested, upon which a large and prosperous population can be supported, a transformation of such lands to the purposes that I have suggested puts off for many and many a day and many and many a year one of the most serious social and economic questions with which the thinkers and the statesmen of this great country of ours will be confronted.

These lands have paid for themselves over and over again. The price that was paid for the lands that came to this country through the Louisiana purchase, and later through the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, has been put back into the Treasury time and time again in actual cash. So there is no mere financial loss to the country. There can be none. All that is asked now is that the lands that remain, which may not be utilized by the farmer, which can not be occupied as homes, may be made into farming lands and made into homes out of the proceeds of these very lands.

I believe, Mr. President, that the proposed law is so framed as that the fund that it produces will be a constantly accumulating fund. It is altogether improbable in my mind that those who live in the arid country will in later years be coming to Congress and asking for more appropriations for the reclamation of these lands. Under the operations of the bill, if it is honestly and fairly administered, I believe that when the last acre is reclaimed there will be more money in the fund than there will be at any time during the first five years of its operation.

So I care not from what standpoint this measure is viewed, it is a wise measure; it is a humane measure; and from the standpoint of the benefit to the whole country it is a patriotic measure; and I am glad to realize the unanimity with which members on both sides of the Chamber support the measure. It will be cheerful tidings indeed to the people of the arid region of the country who feel, whether justly or not, that they have been taxed unfairly and immoderately for public enterprises in other sections of the country, that their needs are recognized by practically a unanimous vote of the Senate of the United States and they are to be supplied with no stinted hand.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, I have spent my life in the arid regions, and during that time I have witnessed the reclamation of arid lands by the process of irrigation. So far these lands have been reclaimed without any aid from the Treasury of the Federal Government. The homes and the cities which have been built up have been built through the energy and the enterprise of the people who have there sought their homes.

I have looked over the provisions of this bill, although I had no share in its preparation, because I felt that those who were looking after it were competent to intelligently deal with this question. From a constitutional standpoint and from an economic point of view, it seems to me that the bill is entirely free from objection. It has been the policy of this Government under its homestead laws to donate the public lands in any of the States in which there have existed public lands to people who might go upon them and establish their homes there. That is practically what this bill proposes to do. They are lands belonging to the Government of the United States. They are worthless without irrigation. The Government, instead of donating the lands to people who seek to establish their homes upon them, makes provision for the supply of the water, without which the lands are valueless.

Then the bill provides for the return to the fund known as the reclamation fund of contributions by the home seekers, so that the fund may, perhaps, be perpetual, and that the land belonging to the Government shall be made valuable where it is now worthless. It would seem to me that that is not only a rational scheme, but one which would commend itself to every man wherever he might live in this land of ours. Mr. President, this is a public purpose. It is a national enterprise. The building of homes upon lands now belonging to the Government in juxtaposition with our public lands, also the property of the nation, tends to add to the value of the lands which may not be disposed of under this particular scheme.

It is often remarked that this is but the beginning; that we, in the arid-land States, will be knocking at the doors of Congress for more and more appropriations as the years roll by. Mr. President, this does not seem to me, in the brief consideration which I have given to the subject of the bill, to involve any gigantic schemes or any tremendous expenditure of money. Take my own State. There are 50,000,000 acres of land within its boundaries. Most of those lands are mountainous and can not be reclaimed by irrigation. A very large proportion of those lands are so situated that by no scheme of irrigation can they be reclaimed. Perhaps when we have made the final estimate of all the lands that might be benefited under the provisions of this bill they will not exceed 100,000 or 200,000 acres in my own State.

Passing from my State to the State of Idaho, the possibility of reclaiming arid lands there under the provisions of the bill I think are much greater than they are in my own State. Still when a careful estimate is made of lands which will actually be reclaimed under the provisions of the bill, a few hundred thousand acres will cover the aggregate. My judgment is that 10,000,000 acres of land will be the limit of the quantity of land which can be reclaimed under the provisions of this bill.

Now, Mr. President, the success of this measure will depend upon its intelligent administration. Very large discretion is committed, and I think necessarily committed, to the Secretary of the Interior. If it is wisely administered it will be of great benefit. It will be an economical disposition of public funds. If it is unwisely administered it may meet with the condemnation of people in the very States to which it is to apply. For instance, I can imagine a Secretary who might decide upon projects which were impracticable, in reference to lands which can not be reclaimed, who might attempt to carry on a scheme of irrigation which would not only be a waste of the public funds but would be disapproved by the people who desire their reclamation by some reasonable method. I have no reason, and we have no reason, to assume that any such mistake will be made in the administration of this bill. I sincerely hope there will not be.

Mr. President, I invite attention to the fact that in 1889, I think it was, Congress authorized the Geological Survey to make selection of reservoir sites and in connection with that certain quantities of land were to be reserved for purposes of irrigation. Under the provisions of that act numerous reservoir sites were selected, and large tracts of land were reserved from public entry. In 1892, after these reservoirs had been made under the provisions of that law, it was found that instead of promoting the settlement of the West, it obstructed its settlement. The Government having reserved those lands and shut out individuals who would seek to reclaim them by private enterprise and private expenditure, refusing to make the expenditure on its own account out of the National Treasury, these sites, suitable to reservoirs and land susceptible of reclamation were in a state of enforced idleness, so to speak, and in 1892 Congress found it necessary to repeal that law and restore those lands to the public domain and make them subject to entry under the public-land laws of the United States.

Mr. President, if this measure is to prove successful, the utmost care will be necessary on the part of the officials who are to administer it. If they go out without due consideration and make selection of reservoir sites and reserve large tracts of land which will not any longer be open to entry except under the provisions of this bill, and then stop short and delay for years and years, the execution of the enterprise, instead of promoting the development and settlement of the West, it will be greatly retarded. If those who administer this bill go into the West and select certain localities where with great propriety the provisions of this bill may be carried into execution, and shall proceed promptly and efficiently to carry out the work to a successful conclusion, it will be a great stimulus and will be a great advantage. There are perhaps one or two localities in my State alone to which this bill can have application.

The Senators from the East say they perhaps have no very direct interest in this matter. I know there are certain States in the West enumerated in the bill which can not be benefited to any very great extent under the specific provisions herein contained. Yet it ought to pass.

Now, with respect to the establishment of reservoirs, there are very few cases in which a reservoir can be established and successfully maintained. Those who have devoted much time to the consideration of the question of reservoirs and their maintenance well recognize this fact. They are built in narrow gorges, the extent of which is very limited. The reservoirs fill up with silt and sand and wash, which are permitted to flow into the reservoirs, and it is but a short time until they are filled up. The expense of maintaining them will be greater than the cost of their original construction.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think the Senator from Utah is mistaken as to the places in which reservoirs may be constructed. The criticism that he makes upon reservoirs constructed in mountains is not altogether without substance, but reservoirs more vast in extent and impounding an immensely greater volume of water may be constructed out on the plains; reservoirs which, by reason of the topography of the ground, at very little expense may be made absolutely safe.

Mr. RAWLINS. I was approaching that. The only object I have in the remarks I am making is to throw out some suggestions which I think may be valuable if they are considered in the administration of this measure. I am entirely in favor of it and shall cast my vote for it.

There are many cases, as I was about to say when I was interrupted by the Senator from Colorado, where reservoirs can be maintained. For instance, in my State there is a reservoir, a lake now, 5 miles in width and 15 or 20 miles in length. The water is raised by means of dams to an elevation called high-water mark. From that it is drawn down as the water is needed, some 5 or 6 feet, the water being drawn away by five or six different canals; and it is of the utmost utility to the valley in which is situated the city of Salt Lake.

In the northern part of my State and the borders of Idaho there is what is known as Bear Lake, by which flows the Bear River. There is a case where a reservoir may be established of the utmost value, which will lead to the reclamation of a considerable area of land now worthless; and, doubtless, in every State such places may be found. I simply desire to allude to the situation and to point to the fact that if this measure is intelligently administered it will be a success and will result in great benefit and no detriment to the public welfare of the country.

Mr. President, no project ought to be undertaken until it is considered and until they have determined to proceed with it to its completion as promptly as it is possible in the nature of the work for that to be done. When the structure is completed under the bill it is to be turned over to the regulation of the laws of the State in which the work is located. The people who get the benefit of it pay for the advantage which they receive by turning into this reclamation fund the amount of the expenditure necessary for its completion. When that is done the account is balanced up between the Government and the individuals who receive the benefit of this beneficent expenditure.

Many places in Idaho, doubtless in Wyoming, Colorado, and in other States mentioned here will be greatly benefited under the provisions of this bill. On the other hand, if some agent, having little regard to his responsibility, is designated to select those sites, and they are selected without due consideration as to their practicability, and private enterprise is shut out, and those who would make settlements and by their own energy and expenditure establish homes are prevented from doing so, and the Government then delays the execution of this work, instead of its being a public benefit, it will be greatly to the disadvantage of the States in which that thing should occur.

Mr. President, this is all I desire to say. If this project is completed, it will not, in my judgment, involve a very great expenditure on the part of the Federal Government. If wisely administered, it will be of great advantage, and I shall cheerfully give my vote in its favor.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, the last river and harbor bill carried about $50,000,000. In glancing through that bill I find there are nine or ten States which did not receive a dollar. I see that Colorado is one of those States; Idaho is another; Montana is another; Nebraska did not receive anything, and South Dakota received only $52,000; North Dakota did not receive anything; neither did Utah, and Wyoming received only a small amount.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. What amount, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. CLAY. I think $100,000.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It was struck out.

Mr. CLAY. Anyhow, the States that are to be the particular beneficiaries of this legislation practically received nothing in the last river and harbor bill.

The people of my State, directly speaking, are not interested in the subject of irrigation, but as a Senator, representing in part a Southern State, I am glad to give my vote and aid to those States in reclaiming these lands and preparing them for homes for citizens in the future. As a matter of justice, we ought to do it, and I am glad to see a unanimous sentiment on this side of the Chamber in favor of it. I am aware of the fact that we are now anxious to vote, and I will not take the time of the Senate further in giving the reasons why I am in favor of this legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROMOTION OF COMMERCE.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1348) to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and the common defense; to promote commerce, and to encourage the deep-sea fisheries.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to ask the Senator from Maine if it is his intention to take up the bill and press it until we come to a vote on it. I am anxious to be present when the bill is discussed——

Mr. FRYE. I do not suppose that to-day——

Mr. CLAY. I mean continuously, until it is disposed of?

Mr. FRYE. Yes; continuously, except yielding at times for appropriation bills and measures of that kind.

Mr. CLAY. I am compelled to be absent in Georgia part of next week and I am very anxious to be present when the measure is discussed. Does the Senator intend to press it Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, unless appropriation bills come in. I understand there are two appropriation bills that are likely to come in, and then this measure will be temporarily laid aside, if there be no objection, to permit the appropriation bills to be considered.

Mr. BACON. I suppose, anyhow, the Senator from Maine will give Senators who are not ready a reasonable time for debate, and will not insist on a vote——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, this question is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. CLAY. I am sure, at least I think I am, that there is no disposition on this side of the Chamber—there certainly is not so far as I have heard—to do anything in the world except to present arguments a reasonable length of time, and after we get through discussing it, vote.

Mr. FRYE. I simply desire to have it retain its place as the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. CULLOM. When the bill is before the Senate, I desire to move an executive session.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Illinois will allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. FRYE. Has the motion been declared carried?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been.

Mr. HOAR. I should like, as other Senators have been permitted to make a suggestion, to say that I desire at some early opportunity, when the shipping bill is not actually pressing, to call up the bill for the protection of the President of the United States, which has been read and partly discussed to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following report:

The Committee of Conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5833) temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out of the matter inserted by said amendment the word "exportation" and insert in lieu thereof "shipment;" strike out the word "now" in line 15 of the matter inserted by said amendment; after the word "duty" in the matter inserted by said amendment insert "under the provisions of this act;" and strike out in line 16 of the matter inserted by said amendment the word "exported" and insert "coming;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out all of the amendment after the word "further," in line 2 of the matter inserted, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the Philippine Commission shall be authorized and empowered to issue licenses to engage in lighterage or other exclusively harbor business, to vessels or other craft actually engaged in such business at the date of the passage of this act, and to vessels or other craft built in the Philippine Islands or in the United States and owned by citizens of the United States or by inhabitants of the Philippine Islands;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out all of the section and insert in lieu thereof a new section, as follows: "That the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of revenues,' approved June 10, 1890, as amended by an act entitled 'An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States,' approved July 24, 1897, shall apply to all articles coming in to the United States from the Philippine Archipelago;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out all the matter inserted by said amendment after the word "court," in line 5; and the Senate agree to the same.

H. C. LODGE,
W. B. ALLISON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
SERENO E. PAYNE,
JOHN DALZELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HOAR. What are the amendments of the Senate that are agreed to? I should like some general knowledge about it.

Mr. LODGE. The House has agreed substantially to every amendment of the Senate. The sections that have been read in full are mere changes of phraseology and not of purport. The only changes that are more than verbal are the omission of the latter half of the amendment to the treason and sedition laws and the recession by the Senate from the amendment in regard to adding the United States tonnage tax to the local tonnage tax.

Mr. HOAR. What does my colleague mean by the "latter half of the amendment to the treason and sedition laws?"

Mr. LODGE. It was offered by my colleague as a second amendment, but it appears in the bill as one amendment; that is, the witnesses and the modification of the clause relating to the misprision of treason.

Mr. HOAR. But the provision about what shall constitute treason is retained?

Mr. LODGE. It is retained. The part about witnesses is retained.

Mr. HOAR. I may as well take this occasion to call attention to what I understand to be the fact.

I understand that the then President, Mr. McKinley, on the 7th of April, 1900, addressed to the president of the Philippine Commission a letter of instruction which is given in the annual report of the Secretary of War for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900. I can not find that those instructions have ever been repealed, modified, or in any way weakened in their force and effect by any authority of our Administration in Washington, and among them is this:

At the same time the Commission should bear in mind, and the people of the islands should be made plainly to understand, that there are certain great principles of government which have been made the basis of our governmental system, which we deem essential to the rule of law and the maintenance of individual freedom, and of which they have, unfortunately, been denied the experience possessed by us; that there are also certain practical rules of government which we have found to be essential to the preservation of these great principles of liberty and law, and that these principles and these rules of government must be established and maintained in their islands for the sake of their liberty and happiness, however much they may conflict with the customs or laws of procedure with which they are familiar.

It is evident that the most enlightened thought of the Philippine Islands fully appreciates the importance of these principles and rules, and they will inevitably within a short time command universal assent. Upon every division and branch of the government of the Philippines, therefore, must be imposed these inviolable rules:

That no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

I skip some others which are found generally in our amendments to the Constitution.

That no law shall be passed abridging the freedom of speech or of the press or of the rights of the people to peaceably assemble and petition the government for a redress of grievances.

I hope when the investigating committee make their report we will learn by what authority that provision has been flagrantly and flatly denied, as appears from the report as to the treason and sedition law which so far is in flat conflict with it.

I should not consent, without a strenuous resistance, to the adoption of this report if the law in regard to treason—what makes the substance of treason, requiring an overt act—which was placed there by the Senate with absolute unanimity, had been stricken out by the House.

In regard to the other part of that law making mothers punishable if they do not inform against their sons and making sons punishable if they do not inform against their mothers, and so on, I have no doubt whatever that practically, whatever stands on the statute book, it never would be enforced. Those of the gentlemen of the Commission whom I know or know about, and for whom I have high respect, would never practically see that anybody was punished under that rule under those circumstances; and I have no doubt if they had thought of it they would have been willing enough to put it into their law.

They took their law, by inadvertence, from an ancient law of ours which was leveled at the offense of betraying the country to a foreign foe—an offense for which mothers would denounce their sons and wives would quit their husbands—one of the most odious and infamous offenses known to mankind, and their only mistake was in that particular that they were not careful when they undertook to apply old laws to new conditions. It is one of the things which shows the impossibility of foreign rule over an alien people being exercised without carelessness, even by the most humane and well-meaning men.

I should like to say, because my vote the other day has been the subject of some criticism, that I understand this bill to be a mere provision as to the regulations and conditions upon which vessels and cargoes from this country shall enter the ports of the Philippine Islands from other countries and on what condition vessels and cargoes from the Philippine Islands shall come into this country. I do not understand that it involves the principle of an assertion of a permanent political power, and it does not deal, one way or the other, with the political action which has been taken out there under our authority.

It is a necessity arising out of the fact of mere possession that the power so in possession shall declare on what terms ships and cargoes may come in.

I do not wish to be understood in supporting this bill to have in the least abandoned or departed from what I consider the true principles of constitutional liberty, which in my humble way I have asserted heretofore.

Mr. LODGE. It is a temporary measure.

Mr. HOAR. It is a temporary necessity growing out of our position, just as it is to regulate a camp wherever you have one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. BACON. I present certain amendments which I propose at the proper time to offer to the bill (S. 3653) for the protection of the President of the United States, and for other purposes. I ask that they may now be read and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia proposes amendments to the bill which was under consideration this morning, which at his request will be read.

The Secretary read the amendments, which appear later in the proceedings.

Mr. BACON. The bill was read at length during the present session, and I now ask that the bill may be printed in connection with my amendments in order that Senators may see the bill and the amendments together.

Mr. HOAR. I hope my honorable friend the Senator from Georgia will be ready, say after next Monday, if an opportunity should come, to have the bill taken up for consideration. It is a very important bill and should not be delayed a great while. I have not pressed it to-day, in deference to the Senator's desire, and I shall not press it on Monday unless he is ready; but after Monday I shall feel it my duty to press it when a convenient opportunity comes.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will probably remember what was said in regard to that matter when he moved to take up the bill——

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. BACON. That there would be ample opportunity for debate.

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I do not suppose there will be any disposition to ask for any more time than is requisite for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Georgia please repeat his request?

Mr. BACON. I stated that the bill had already been read at length to-day, and I asked that the original bill might be printed in the RECORD in connection with the amendments which I propose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill referred to is as follows:

A bill (S. 3653) for the protection of the President of the United States, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, willfully kill or cause the death of the President or Vice-President of the United States, or any officer thereof upon whom the powers and duties of the President may devolve under the Constitution and laws, or who shall willfully cause the death of the sovereign or chief magistrate of any foreign country, shall be punished with death.

SEC. 2. That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, attempt to commit either of the offenses mentioned in the foregoing section shall be punished with death.

SEC. 3. That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, instigate, advise, or counsel the killing of the President or Vice-President of the United States, or any officer thereof upon whom the powers and duties of the President may devolve under the Constitution and laws, or shall conspire with any other person to accomplish the same, or who shall instigate, advise, or counsel the killing of the sovereign or chief magistrate of any foreign country, or shall conspire with any other person to accomplish the same, shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding twenty years.

SEC. 4. That any person who has conspired as aforesaid may be indicted and convicted separately, although the other party or parties to the conspiracy are not indicted or convicted.

SEC. 5. That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, by spoken words, or by written or printed words, uttered or published, threaten to kill or advise or instigate another to kill the President or Vice-President of the United States, or any officer thereof upon whom the powers and duties of the office of President of the United States may devolve under the Constitution and laws, shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding ten years.

SEC. 6. That any person who shall willfully and knowingly aid in the escape from punishment of any person guilty of either of the offenses mentioned in the foregoing sections shall be deemed an accomplice after the fact, and shall be punished as if a principal, although the other party or parties to said offense shall not be indicted or convicted.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to select and detail from the Regular Army a sufficient number of officers and men to guard and protect the person of the President of the United States without any unnecessary display.

And the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to make special rules and regulations as to dress, arms, and equipment and duties of said guard, and shall publish only such parts of said rules and regulations as he may deem proper.

That the additional expenses of such guard so detailed shall be paid out of the Treasury, on accounts to be certified by the Secretary of War to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendments intended to be offered by Mr. BACON to the foregoing bill are as follows:

After the words "United States," in the first section, in line 6, page 1, of the bill, insert the following words:

"Because of his official position, or for the purpose of destroying the Government or impairing the execution of its constitutional powers."

Amend further by striking out from the first section the following words: "Or any officer thereof upon whom the powers and duties of the President may devolve under the Constitution and laws."

Amend by inserting after the word "shall," in the third section, in the first line, page 2, the words "for the reason or for the purpose hereinbefore specified."

Amend section 3 by striking out the words "or any officer thereof upon whom the powers and duties of the President may devolve under the Constitution and laws."

Amend section 5 by inserting after the word "shall," in the fifteenth line, page 2, the words "for the reason or for the purpose hereinbefore specified."

Strike out from section 5 "or any officer thereof upon whom the powers and duties of the office of President of the United States may devolve under the Constitution and laws."

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 3, 1902.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal, without objection, will stand approved.

DEPARTMENTAL EMPLOYEES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the Postmaster-General; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 28, 1902.

SIR: My attention has been called to the resolution of the Senate, dated February 25, 1901, requesting a statement showing "the age of each and every employee in their respective departments, bureaus, and offices, in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, receiving an annual salary or a per diem compensation and continuously employed, and the salary or compensation per annum or per diem of each employee, the number of employees that have been in service ten years or under, and the number in service for every period of years in excess thereof, as eleven, twelve, thirteen, etc., in numerical order."

I have the honor to state that it was found impossible to compile the data desired regarding the postal service without seriously interfering with the dispatch of the public business. The amount of labor required to fully comply with the requirements of the resolution will be appreciated after an examination of the Official Register of the United States, 1899. The first volume, which contains lists of all the employees of all the Departments, exclusive of the postal service, consists of 1,561 pages. Volume 2, which contains lists only of the Post-Office Department and the postal service, consists of 1,567 pages.

I inclose herewith a statement giving the information desired as to the departmental service, including rural free-delivery employees, in Washington.

Very respectfully,

H. C. PAYNE,
Postmaster-General.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

CHARLES C. BURKE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings filed by the court in the cause of Charles C. Burke, administrator of Elizabeth Burke, deceased; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. C. R. MCKENNEY, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 10308) to provide for a permanent Census Office; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

COURT AT CATLETTSBURG, KY.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10070) establishing a United States court at Catlettsburg, in the eastern district of Kentucky, to report it favorably without amendment, and I desire to ask unanimous consent for its consideration at this time.

The Secretary read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3267) to change the boundaries between the southern and central judicial districts of the Indian Territory, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration. It is very brief and a very plain case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not sufficiently familiar with the conditions in the Indian Territory to know from the reading of the bill whether it provides for an additional district for a judge who does not seem to have any district, but holds court all over the Territory.

Mr. HOAR. There is a little strip on the boundaries of these two districts. It is rather a populous strip for that region. The people have to cross the Washita River, where at certain seasons of the year it is not fordable, or go around 120 or 130 miles by rail through Texas. The bill annexes them to the district on the other side, where they get a 30 or 40 mile communication direct by rail. The bill is recommended by both judges, that is, one judge writes that he approves it and the other does not see any objection, and by the Attorney-General's Department. A similar bill has passed the House upon a full report stating these facts. That is all there is to it.

Mr. CULLOM. The only point is that I have understood there was to be a bill providing for another judicial district there.

Mr. HOAR. This is not it.

Mr. CULLOM. I supposed that probably that was the purpose of this bill. I know nothing of it.

Mr. HOAR. The bill has the unanimous approval of the Judiciary Committee, the Attorney-General, and both judges. All the people there want it and there is no opposition to it.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask the chairman of the Judiciary Committee a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. It bears upon the question raised by the Senator from Illinois. Would this bill in any way conflict with the making of a new judicial district in the Indian Territory?

Mr. HOAR. Not the least in the world.

Mr. BURTON. Nor the appointment of a commissioner?

Mr. HOAR. Not at all. It is down at the south part of the Indian Territory. There is a little corner. One of the districts takes in the northeast and the other the west and northwest. To get to Ardmore, the place of holding the court, they have to cross the Washita River, and they sometimes have to wait for weeks and months before they can get there. They go by teams. They can not get to the place of holding court in any other way unless they go around through the State of Texas, more than a hundred miles travel by rail. This little strip is by the bill annexed to another district, where they will have railroad communication.

Mr. BATE. It seems to be a private colloquy that is going on upon the other side of the Chamber. We can not hear on this side what is said.

Mr. HOAR. The bill does not affect in the least the question about a new district in any form, shape, or manner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MINIMUM PUNISHMENT IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. HOAR. I am also directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3512) concerning minimum punishment in certain cases arising in the Indian Territory, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Let me make a statement.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask only one question. The added discretion, as I understood the Clerk to read, is in the court and is not in the direction of additional punishment, but in the direction of making the punishment smaller than the Arkansas law. There is no doubt about that, is there?

Mr. HOAR. That is all. That is clear.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in line 10, to strike out the word "prescribe" and insert "impose;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 33 of the act of Congress of May 3, 1890, entitled "An act * * * to enlarge the jurisdiction of the United States courts in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," is hereby amended by adding the following proviso:

"Provided, That in all cases where punishment prescribed by the laws of Arkansas is adopted by said section, the court shall not be compelled thereby to impose the minimum punishment established therein, but may in its discretion impose a less punishment by way of fine or imprisonment, or both, as justice shall seem to require."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to make one statement in a single sentence. The Indian Territory penal code, in the section referred to, adopts the law of Arkansas, and the law of Arkansas makes the punishment for certain cases of larceny and some others a five years' imprisonment, and no less. The Attorney-General wrote a communication to me to the effect that there were difficulties in getting convictions by reason of that severity, and a great many applications, perfectly well founded, for pardon because of the undue severity of the punishment. Therefore we reported this bill.

It is in accordance with the action of the Senate in every case since I have been here, where its attention has been called to the matter, and in accordance with the uniform policy of the committee, that there shall be no minimum punishment except in some very extraordinary cases of crime, but that ordinarily the court shall have power in its discretion to impose a less penalty. So, in fact, the court, after this bill passes, instead of being compelled to sentence everybody who commits a certain larceny to at least five years' imprisonment, may use its discretion.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill go through.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, one moment. My attention has just been called by the Senator from Maine to a statement which he understoood to be that all larceny is punished by five years' imprisonment in Arkansas.

Mr. HOAR. I did not say that. I said that certain cases of larceny are so punished.

Mr. BERRY. Horse stealing.

Mr. HOAR. Horse stealing is the chief case.

Mr. HALE. I did not hear that.

Mr. HOAR. The bill goes further than to apply to horse stealing, and says that in every case under that code where there is an absolute minimum punishment the court shall not be bound to inflict so much, but may inflict less at its discretion. It is in accord with the universal policy of the legislation of the United States in such matters.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I have no interest in the matter except to have the statement made correctly. The laws of Arkansas punish horse stealing with five years' imprisonment. I think that was repealed, however, at the last session of the legislature. For ordinary grand larceny, twelve months is, I think, the minimum punishment.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The punishment for horse stealing is imprisonment for not less than five years nor more than fifteen years.

Mr. BERRY. That was the old law. I think the last legislature amended it.

Mr. HOAR. That is the old law; so that the United States is doing just what Arkansas has done. The old law is what we have modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LUCY JANE BALL.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by himself on the 28th ultimo, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Lucy Jane Ball, mother of J. J. G. Ball, late a messenger of the United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving at the time of his demise, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently said: At the session of to-day a resolution was passed for the payment to Lucy Jane Ball of six months' salary of J. J. G. Ball, late a messenger in the Senate. It should be the widow instead of the mother. I ask that the vote by which the resolution was passed may be reconsidered for the purpose of amending the resolution in the way I have suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to reconsider the vote by which the resolution referred to by him was passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I now move to amend the resolution by striking out the word "mother" after the name "Lucy Jane Ball" and inserting "widow."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Mr. BEVERIDGE introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

VONNIE K. TURNER.

Mr. HEITFELD (for Mr. TURNER) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Vonnie K. Turner, widow of Walter P. Turner, late a laborer of the United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving at the time of his demise, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on February 28, approved and signed the act (S. 1143) granting an increase of pension to Charles L. Sweatt.

The message also announced that the President had, on the 1st instant, approved and signed the act (S. 1573) to authorize Commander James M. Miller, United States Navy, Surg. Oliver D. Norton, United States Navy, and Mr. Edwin V. Morgan, formerly secretary of the legation of the United States at Seoul, Korea, to accept presents tendered to them by His Majesty the Emperor of Germany.

JAMES W. HOWELL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 24) for the relief of James W. Howell, which was, in line 12, after the words "eighteen hundred and sixty-five," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

RHODY ANN BRADSHAW.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3157) granting an increase of pension to Rhody Ann Bradshaw, which was in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twenty."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate agree to the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

MARY T. BRUCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3204) granting an increase of pension to Mary T. Bruce, which was in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twenty."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate agree to the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ETTA SCOTT MITCHELL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1931) granting an increase of pension to Etta Scott Mitchell; which was in line 9, to strike out all after "receiving" down to and including "years" in line 11.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate agree to the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM S. DERBY.

The bill (H. R. 8180) granting an increase of pension to William S. Derby was read twice by its title.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senate has passed a bill in identical terms with that bill, carrying the same rate of pension, and I ask unanimous consent that the House bill may be put upon its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of William S. Derby, late of Company A, Sixty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think perhaps the Senate bill ought to be recalled from the House, and I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not gone to the House.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I ask that it may be reconsidered and indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote by which the bill

(S. 2815) granting an increase of pension to William S. Derby was passed will be reconsidered, without objection, and the bill indefinitely postponed.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT SAVANNAH, GA.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I am compelled to leave the Senate after Thursday for a few days, and I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1545) to establish a marine hospital at Savannah, Ga., and put it on its passage. It will not lead to any debate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase land adjoining that which was purchased by the United States to be used for United States courts, post-office, and other purposes at Savannah, Ga., and subsequently abandoned for such use, provided cession of jurisdiction from the State of Georgia satisfactory to him can be secured, or to exchange such land now owned by the United States for other land in said city satisfactory to him, and to erect thereon buildings suitable for a marine hospital: Provided, That the limit of cost shall not exceed $200,000 inclusive of the site, or $175,000 exclusive of the site.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID H. LEWIS.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 688) for the relief of David H. Lewis. It is a little private relief bill that will not occupy more than five minutes' time.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimons consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to David H. Lewis, of Lawrence, Kans., the sum of $1,000 for personal injuries sustained in a railroad wreck at Elmdale, Kans., on the 15th of October, 1887, while acting as a substitute postal clerk in the Railway Mail Service of the United States and in the line of duty.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to know upon what theory the bill is based. Is it understood that the United States is liable for compensation to every person who, being in Government service as a railway postal clerk or otherwise, is injured while in the line of his duty?

Mr. HARRIS. What is the question of the Senator?

Mr. HOAR. The question I put is, What is the principle on which the bill is based? Is it claimed——

Mr. HARRIS. I can answer the question in a moment. It is the custom of the Department to pay a railway postal clerk a year's salary when he has been injured and absolutely incapacitated for any further service. This man was acting regularly as a substitute. The Department is therefore unable to pay him, but it is exactly in the same line with the cases allowed.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, if that be the ground on which the bill is put, I am glad to have the statement go into the RECORD. I was afraid that it was undertaking to establish a principle of some obligation on the part of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. Not at all. It is simply following out the general precedent, except that this man was a substitute with authority instead of a regular employee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Before the Senator from New Hampshire goes on, I rise to a question of the order of business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Is the remainder of the morning hour mortgaged for the consideration of any particular bill?

The President pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII is the regular order until 2 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. I was going to ask that we proceed with its consideration. After the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is through, I ask that we take up the Calendar and proceed with it in regular order under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] as soon as the bill to be called up by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is disposed of.

ALLEN V. REED.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 192) authorizing the appointment of Allen V. Reed, now a captain on the retired list of the Navy, as a rear-admiral on the retired list of the Navy.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Allen V. Reed, now a captain on the retired list of the Navy, to be a rear-admiral on the retired list of the Navy, with the rank and pay of that office, the appointment to date from the 22d day of November, 1898.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the bill carry arrears until the time named in it?

Mr. GALLINGER. Until November 22, 1898—about three years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON STATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOME.

Mr. HALE. Now let us go on with the Calendar in regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine demands the regular order, which is the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII. The first bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 1912) granting to the State of Washington 50,000 acres of land to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Washington State Soldiers and Sailors' Home was announced as first in order.

Mr. HALE. There are some Senators who want that bill to go over. Let it go over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Retaining its place?

Mr. HALE. Yes; retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

JOSEPH W. PARISH.

The bill (S. 475) to refer the claim of Joseph W. Parish to the Secretary of the Treasury for examination and payment of any balance found due was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to make full and complete examination into the claim of Joseph W. Parish against the United States for balance alleged to be due him by virtue of a contract made by J. W. Parish & Co. with Henry Johnson, a medical storekeeper, acting on behalf of the United States, which contract bears date March 5, 1863, and provides that said J. W. Parish & Co. should furnish to the United States for the use of the Medical Department of the Army the whole amount of ice required to be consumed at Memphis and Nashville, Tenn.; St. Louis, Mo., and Cairo, Ill., during the remainder of the year 1863; that the Secretary shall determine and ascertain the full amount which should have been paid said J. W. Parish & Co. if the contract had been carried out in full, without change or default made by either of the parties thereto, under the rule of the measure of damages laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of United States against Behan (110 U. S. Rep., p. 338), and in accordance with the evidence in the case collected by the United States Court of Claims, and after determining the full amount thus due J. W. Parish & Co., under the contract and rule of law aforesaid, to deduct therefrom all payments which have been made to J. W. Parish & Co. or to Joseph W. Parish, whether in pursuance of judgments of the court or direct appropriation by Congress or otherwise, stating what balance, if any, is due under the rule and evidence prescribed herein, and to pay the balance to said Joseph W. Parish, the present owner of the claim.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FLORA A. DARLING.

The bill (S. 1902) for the relief of Flora A. Darling was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Mrs. Flora A. Darling $5,683 in full satisfaction of all claims growing out of her arrest, imprisonment, and the seizure of her property by military authority at the city of New Orleans, in January, 1864, while on a flag-of-truce boat under protection of a safe conduct given her by Maj. Gen. N. P. Banks, then commanding the Department of the Gulf.

Mr. LODGE. What is the amount named in the bill, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Five thousand six hundred and eighty-three dollars.

Mr. LODGE. As the Senator in charge of that bill is absent——

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I understand there is no opposition to the bill. It was unanimously passed by the committee, and it has been favorably reported two or three times both in the House of Representatives and in the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; if the Senator from Georgia knows about the claim I have no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN W. GUMMO.

The bill (S. 2237) for the relief of John W. Gummo was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John W. Gummo, late of Company F, Twelfth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry, $190, that being the balance of bounty due him for services rendered the Government during the war of the rebellion.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLARA H. FULFORD.

The bill (S. 916) for the relief of Clara H. Fulford was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It instructs the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem, in favor of Mrs. Clara H. Fulford, widow of D. Fulford, two bonds of the United States, of the denominations of $50 and $50, and known as five-twenties, the bonds having been destroyed by fire on the 9th of July, 1872, and to pay to Mrs. Clara H. Fulford, widow of D. Fulford, the amount of the bonds, together with accrued interest from July 1, 1872, to the date of the maturity of the said bonds; and provides that Mrs. Clara H. Fulford shall also execute and file with the Secretary of the Treasury a bond with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, in the penalty of $300, conditioned to save harmless the United States from loss or liability on account of the said bonds or the interest accrued thereon.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HARLOW L. STREET.

The bill (S. 942) for the relief of Harlow L. Street was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 7, after the words "volunteers, a," to strike out "captain and commissary of subsistence" and insert "first lieutenant of cavalry;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Harlow L. Street, late a first lieutenant, First United States Cavalry, and captain and commissary of subsistence of volunteers, a first lieutenant of cavalry in the Army of the United States, and, when so appointed, he shall be placed on the retired list of officers of the Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OUACHITA RIVER BRIDGE, ARKANSAS.

The bill (S. 3261) authorizing the Eldorado and Bastrop Railway Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Ouachita River, in the State of Arkansas, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in section 3, on page 3, line 19, after the word "rivers," to insert the word "or;" so as to read:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify any of the provisions of law now existing in reference to the protection of the navigation of rivers or to exempt said bridge from the operation of the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF W. T. SCOTT AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 678) for the relief of W. T. Scott and others was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Treasurer of the United States to refund to the heirs of W. T. Scott and to William Umdenstock, of Harrison County, Tex., or to their heirs or legal representatives, $2,750 each, that being the amount erroneously paid by W. T. Scott and William Umdenstock severally into the Treasury of the United States on the 17th of September, 1881, in compromise of a judgment recovered against them as sureties on the official bond of Davis B. Bonfoey, late collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Texas, in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Texas on the 11th of December, 1873, in a cause No. 1037, wherein the United States were plaintiffs and W. T. Scott and others defendants, and appropriates $5,500, to be made immediately available for that purpose.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RICHMOND COLLEGE.

The bill (S. 1516) for the relief of Richmond College, located at Richmond, Va., was announced as next in order.

Mr. MARTIN. That bill has passed the Senate as a clause in the omnibus claims bill. I think it had better stay on the Calendar for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The bill will be temporarily passed over, retaining its place.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN RENO, NEV.

The bill (S. 162) for the erection of a public building in Reno, Nev., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Reno, State of Nevada, the cost of the site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, not to exceed $70,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LABORATORY FOR GAS INSPECTORS IN THE DISTRICT.

The bill (H. R. 8336) to amend section 3 of chapter 480 of the laws of the United States, approved June 23, 1874, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 3 of chapter 480 of the laws of the United States, approved June 23, 1874, so that it shall read:

SEC. 3. That a laboratory shall be provided and fitted up by the Washington Gaslight Company, subject to the approval of the inspector, in the central part of the city of Washington, at a distance as near as may be of 2,000 feet from any gas works, and furnished with suitable apparatus for the transaction of the business of the inspector and assistant inspector for which it is intended; and the laboratory shall be kept open on all business days between the hours of 9 o'clock in the forenoon and 4 o'clock in the afternoon: Provided, That the cost of fitting up said laboratory shall be paid for by each gas company in the District of Columbia in proportion to their sale of gas for the year 1873.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GRAND FORKS, N. DAK.

The bill (S. 598) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Grand Forks, N. Dak., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other governmental offices in the city of Grand Forks and State of North Dakota, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, not to exceed the sum of $180,000.

Proposals for the sale of land suitable for said site shall be invited by public advertisement in one or more of the newspapers of said city of largest circulation for at least twenty days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for the opening of said proposals.

Proposals made in response to said advertisement shall be addressed and mailed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall then cause the said proposed sites, and such others as he may think proper to designate, to be examined in person by an agent of the Treasury Department, who shall make written report to said Secretary of the results of said examination and of his recommendation thereon, and the reasons therefor, which shall be accompanied by the original proposals and all maps, plats, and statements which shall have come into his possession relating to the said proposed sites.

If, upon consideration of said report and accompanying papers, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Treasury Department, which commission shall also examine the said proposed sites, and such others as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and grant such hearings in relation thereto as they shall deem necessary; and said commission shall within thirty days after such examination make to the Secretary of the Treasury written report of their conclusion in the premises, accompanied by all statements, maps, plats, or documents taken by or submitted to them, in like manner as hereinbefore provided in regard to the proceedings of said agent of the Treasury Department; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon finally determine the location of the building to be erected.

The compensation of said commissioners shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the same shall not exceed $6 per day and actual traveling expenses: Provided, however, That the member of said commission appointed from the Treasury Department shall be paid only his actual traveling expenses.

The building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Grand Forks, in the State of North Dakota."

SPECIAL-IMPROVEMENT ASSESSMENTS IN THE DISTRICT.

The bill (S. 3364) to authorize the apportionment of assessments for special improvements, etc., in the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to apportion all unpaid assessments for special improvements levied by the board of public works, or which have been or shall hereafter be levied by them, and all unpaid assessments which have been or shall hereafter be levied for benefits arising from the extension, widening, or opening of streets, avenues, or alleys, or the taking of private property for other public purposes, where the lots or parts of lots upon which such assessments were or may be levied have been or shall be subdivided, so that each lot in such subdivisions shall only be assessed for and chargeable with such proportion of such assessments as in the judgment of said Commissioners is equitably chargeable thereto, and that the several portions of any assessments so apportioned shall have the same force and effect as the original assessment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOT 1, SQUARE 1113, IN WASHINGTON CITY.

The bill (H. R. 3740) to confirm title to lot 1, square 1113, in Washington, D. C., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to release and quitclaim to Johanna C. Block, her heirs and assigns forever, all the right, title, and interest, whether legal or equitable, of the United States of America in and to all that lot or parcel of ground situated in the city of Washington, D. C., and known on the ground plan of the city as lot No. 1, in square 1113, upon the payment by her of such a sum as the Secretary of the Interior shall deem just and equitable; but that she pay to the proper officer of the District of Columbia all taxes heretofore assessed against the property, both general and special, now unpaid and standing against said property.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REDEMPTION OF CERTAIN INTERNAL-REVENUE STAMPS.

Mr. ALDRICH. When the Calendar was last under consideration the bill (H. R. 6570) to amend the act of May 12, 1900, authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to redeem or make allowance for internal-revenue stamps was passed over at the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. The Senator is now ready to have the bill proceeded with, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be taken up.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments, in line 7, page 1, after the word "excepting," to insert "unused;" in line 10, after the "act," to strike out "Provided further, That any such stamps erroneously attached and canceled may be redeemed at any time within two years after the affixing and cancellation of the same;" in line 5, page 2, after the word "excepting," to insert "unused," and in line 9, page 2, to strike out "Provided, further, That any such stamps erroneously attached and canceled may be redeemed at any time within two years after the affixing and cancellation of the same;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to redeem or make allowance for internal-revenue stamps," approved May 12, 1900, be amended by adding to the second proviso the following: "Excepting unused documentary and proprietary stamps issued under the act of June 13, 1898, which stamps may be redeemed upon presentation within two years after the passage of this act," so that said proviso shall read as follows: "Provided further, That no claim for the redemption of or allowance for stamps shall be allowed unless presented within two years after the purchase of said stamps from the Government, excepting unused documentary and proprietary stamps issued under the act of June 13, 1898, which stamps may be redeemed upon presentation within two years after the passage of this act."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the difference between unused and uncanceled stamps? I see the committee have stricken out the proviso with regard to stamps erroneously attached and canceled, and that they use the word "unused." Does that apply to all unused stamps?

Mr. ALDRICH. It does; that is, the extension of the statute of limitations applies to all unused stamps. The act of 1900 provided that those stamps might be redeemed within two years after their purchase. This bill, if it is amended as the committee suggests, will authorize the redemption of those stamps within two years from its passage.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will it cover stamps that were erroneously attached and canceled? Why not let them come in?

Mr. ALDRICH. The committee were of the impression that the two years they have now is sufficient for the purpose of redemption of stamps of that kind. They have two years from the time of their purchase.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; but I know a case or two from Missouri where the two years have expired. They were in controversy with the local officer in regard to it and did not know but that their application was made in time, until it was finally decided by the Secretary of the Treasury; and I do not see why, when there is no question of fraud or anything of that kind, those stamps should not be redeemed just the same as the unused ones.

Mr. ALDRICH. In the opinion of the committee the limitation which now exists is sufficient for all that class of cases. If there are exceptions it is better that they shall be taken care of by special acts rather than to open the door, which would be very wide and lead to very deleterious results to the Government, in the opinion of the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not see how it could lead to any deleterious results simply to give the Secretary of the Treasury power to audit and determine the whole question.

Mr. ALDRICH. Because there is a large class of claims of a nature somewhat analogous to those suggested by the Senator from Missouri to which this bill ought not to apply, in the opinion of the committee.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE W. KING.

The bill (S. 2966) for the relief of George W. King was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that certain property heretofore purchased by and conveyed to George W. King, of Washington, D. C., be relieved and exempted from the operation of the act to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories to American citizens and to remit all forfeitures incurred by force of that act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SONS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to ask unanimous consent to call up——

Mr. LODGE. Regular order!

Mr. SCOTT. Hear my explanation. If it is not satisfactory I will not insist on my request. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 106) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Pennsylvania Society of the Sons of the American Revolution certain Revolutionary trophies at Allegheny Arsenal, Pittsburg, Pa. They are moving the supplies away from there, and the society asks to have these old relics allotted to them.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REDEMPTION OF CERTAIN OUTSTANDING DISTRICT CERTIFICATES.

The bill (S. 3243) to redeem certain outstanding certificates of the board of audit of the District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ACCEPTANCE OF DECORATIONS.

The joint resolution (S. R. 31) to authorize Capt. N. M. Brooks, Superintendent of Foreign Mails, Post-Office Department, to accept decorations from the Emperor of Germany, and from the Governments of Liberia and Venezuela, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 3621) to authorize John A. Ockerson, Caspar S. Crowninshield, and Miss Anna Tolman Smith to accept decorations tendered to them by the Government of the French Republic, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING AT MEMPHIS, TENN.

The bill (S. 2982) to extend and enlarge the post-office building at Memphis, Tenn., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment in line 4, after the word "exceed" to strike out "300" and insert "250;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the post-office building at Memphis, Tenn., to be extended and enlarged at a total cost to the United States of not to exceed $250,000, including all necessary changes in and alterations and repairs of the present building, and of the heating and plumbing systems therein, which may be incident to the extension and enlargement of said building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EASTERN STAR HOME FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (H. R. 2678) to incorporate the Eastern Star Home for the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The bill (S. 3327) in amendment of sections 22 and 26 of an act approved February 2, 1901, entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States," was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. PROCTOR. Let the bill go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Retaining the same place that it now has on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

GEORGE W. GRAHAM.

The bill (S. 2213) for the relief of George W. Graham was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. WARREN. Let the bill be passed over. It is included in the omnibus bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is it included in the omnibus bill?

Mr. WARREN. It is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

ADJUDICATION OF CERTAIN CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 3083) providing for the adjudication of certain claims by the Court of Claims was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, try, determine, and render judgment as in an original suit, with right of appeal as in other cases, the claims of J. F. Bailey & Co., H. E. Collins & Co., and others, for refund of import duties paid by them in excess of the duties imposed by law on steel blooms imported by them during the years 1879, to 1882, both years inclusive.

Mr. BATE. I wish to ask the Senator from Wyoming a question in regard to the bill. Are these claims, by the pending bill, to be paid on the judgment of the Court of Claims without coming to the Congress afterwards?

Mr. WARREN. The bill so provides.

Mr. BATE. It is an exception to the ordinary rule.

Mr. WARREN. Not in cases of this kind. If the Senator will read the report he will see that these differ quite materially from the claims which we send down for findings of fact. We have all the facts.

Mr. BATE. An immense amount of money is involved in this case, and it takes a different course from what is ordinarily pursued.

Mr. WARREN. The amount of money is not so large as would seem from the number of names. The case to me is a very clear one. These parties paid 45 per cent when they should have paid 30, and the United States courts have so decided since. The bill merely seeks to send the claims to the Court of Claims, and if that court shall sustain the contention that these parties overpaid this much and had not proper recourse, and finds good reasons why, the court shall bring in a judgment for the amount.

Mr. BATE. And the bill authorizes the money to be paid without the matter coming back to Congress at all?

Mr. WARREN. Yes, sir.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AARON VAN CAMP AND VIRGINIUS P. CHAPIN.

The bill (S. 342) for the relief of the heirs of Aaron Van Camp and Virginius P. Chapin was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It refers to the Court of Claims the claim of Aaron Van Camp and Virginius P. Chapin against the United States, to hear and determine the question of the liability of the United States for the losses found by the court in its sixth finding of fact, with jurisdiction to hear and determine the same upon the principles of law and equity and in compliance with the rules and regulations of the court.

Mr. COCKRELL. There ought to be some provision in the bill requiring the suit to be brought within a reasonable time.

Mr. McCUMBER. I suppose when the matter is referred to the Court of Claims there is no necessity for further action.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

WILLIAM A. COWLES.

The bill (S. 1680) for the relief of William A. Cowles, administrator of the estate of George Cowles, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McCUMBER. That claim is in the omnibus claims bill, as I understand, and it may be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (S. R. 8) construing the act approved June 27, 1890, entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents."

Mr. BURROWS. Let the joint resolution be passed over for the present, retaining its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GREEN BAY, WIS.

The bill (S. 1266) for the erection of a public building at Green Bay, Wis., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Green Bay and State of Wisconsin, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $150,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

The bill (S. 3653) for the protection of the President of the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The patron of the bill is not present. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. RAWLINS. Let it be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over temporarily, retaining its place on the Calendar.

CHARLES HURRLE.

The bill (S. 2122) for the relief of Charles Hurrle was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that a House bill came to the Senate, I think on Saturday, of the same tenor as the Senate bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. In the same language?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So the Chair understands.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask then that the House bill be taken up and considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The House bill is before the Committee on Claims. The Chair suggests that the Senate bill be temporarily passed over.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be temporarily passed over then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, such will be considered as the action of the Senate.

JAMES G. FIELD.

The bill (S. 1321) to restore to the active list of the Navy the name of James G. Field was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments, in line 5, to strike out the word "restore" and insert the word "appoint," and in line 7, in the parenthesis, to strike out the word "relative" before the word "rank;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint James G. Field, assistant surgeon, United States Navy, retired, to the active list of the Navy as a surgeon (with rank of lieutenant) not in line of promotion.

The amendments were agree to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEPOSITIONS BEFORE NAVAL COURTS.

The bill (S. 1103) to authorize the use of depositions before naval courts in certain cases was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the depositions of witnesses stationed or residing at such a distance from the place at which a naval court is ordered to sit, or who are under orders and about to go to such a distance that it is not practicable to secure their personal attendance without incurring great expense or serious loss of time, if taken on reasonable notice to the opposite party and duly authenticated, may be put in evidence before such court in case not capital.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL COURTS-MARTIAL.

The bill (S. 1102) to provide for the convening of general courts-martial at remote stations was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the commandant of any naval station beyond the continental limits of the United States may, by express authority of the President, be empowered to convene general courts-martial for the trial of persons under his command.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OGDEN, UTAH.

The bill (S. 151) to provide for the purchase of a site and for the erection of a building thereon at Ogden, in the State of Utah, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, line 2, after the word "hundred," to strike out the words "and fifty;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States court, post-office, and other offices in the city of Ogden, in the State of Utah. Such site shall contain at least 40,000 square feet of ground. That the cost of such site and building, including the vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, shall not exceed the sum of $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROOFS AND FEES IN ENTRIES OF PUBLIC LAND.

The bill (H. R. 202) to amend section 2294 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 2294 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to read:

SEC. 2294. That hereafter all affidavits, proofs, and oaths of any kind whatsoever required to be made by applicants and entrymen under the homestead, preemption, timber-culture, desert-land, and timber and stone acts may, in addition to those now authorized to take such affidavits, proofs, and oaths, be made before any United States commissioner or commissioner of the court exercising Federal jurisdiction in the territory or before the judge or clerk of any court of record in the land district in which the lands are situated: Provided, That in case the affidavits, proofs, and oaths hereinbefore mentioned be taken out of the county in which the land is located the applicant must show by affidavit, satisfactory to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that it was taken before the nearest or most accessible officer qualified to take said affidavits, proofs, and oaths in the land districts in which the lands applied for are located; but such showing by affidavit need not be made in making final proof if the proof be taken in the town or city where the newspaper is published in which the final proof notice is printed. The proof, affidavit, and oath, when so made and duly subscribed, shall have the same force and effect as if made before the register and receiver, when transmitted to them with the fees and commissions allowed and required by law. That if any witnesses making such proof, or any applicant making such affidavit or oath, shall knowingly, willfully, or corruptly swear falsely to any material matter contained in said proofs, affidavits, or oaths he shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and shall be liable to the same pains and penalties as if he had sworn falsely before the register. That the fees for entries and for final proofs, when made before any other officer than the register and receiver, shall be as follows:

For each affidavit, 25 cents.

For each deposition of claimant or witness, when not prepared by the officer, 25 cents.

For each deposition of claimant or witness, prepared by the officer, $1.

Any officer demanding or receiving a greater sum for such service shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished for each offense by a fine not exceeding $100.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROMOTION OF COMMERCE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being Senate bill 1348.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1348) to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and the common defense; to promote commerce, and to encourage the deep-sea fisheries, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments shall receive first consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If no objection be made, such will be considered the sense of the Senate.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Alabama that the absence of a quorum has been suggested, and it becomes the duty of the Chair to direct the Secretary to call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Dolliver,	Harris,	Patterson,
Allison,	Dryden,	Hawley,	Perkins,
Bacon,	Elkins,	Heitfeld,	Pettus,
Bard,	Fairbanks,	Hoar,	Scott,
Bate,	Foraker,	McCumber,	Simmons,
Berry,	Foster, La.	McLaurin, Miss.	Spooner,
Beveridge,	Foster, Wash.	McLaurin, S. C.	Taliaferro,
Burnham,	Frye,	McMillan,	Teller,
Burrows,	Gallinger,	Mallory,	Vest,
Carmack,	Gibson,	Martin,	Warren,
Clay,	Hale,	Mitchell,	Wetmore.
Cockrell,	Hanna,	Money,
Dillingham,	Hansbrough,	Nelson,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, before the Presiding Officer announced the general agreement I was on the floor addressing the Chair for the purpose of asking that the agreement be qualified to the effect that no amendment adopted on this call should prejudice any amendment to the contrary hereafter offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the bill as in Committee of the Whole will be open to amendment at any time, and later when in the Senate it will be open to amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I shall have no objection to any amendment of that kind. The amendments of the committee are very immaterial. They are clerical errors as a rule. Let the Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. CLAY. I understood the Senator from Maine to state, and I understand it to be the rule, that it will be in order at any time before the bill is voted on to offer new amendments to the bill.

Mr. FRYE. I shall certainly make no objection on account of any parliamentary rule to any amendment that may be offered.

Mr. CLAY. Then it is understood that in agreeing to the request of the Senator from Maine it is with the understanding that any Senator who may desire to offer an amendment before the bill shall come to a final vote shall be entitled to that privilege.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the request made by the Senator from Maine will not prejudice any motion to amend at any time, at any stage of the bill, whether in Committee of the Whole or in the Senate.

Mr. CLAY. And made for any purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Or made for any purpose. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Commerce was in section 2, page 3, line 3, to strike out the word "steel," before "screw," and in line 4, after the word "steamships," to insert the words "of iron or steel;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That section 3 of the act aforesaid be, and the same is hereby, amended to read:

"SEC. 3. That the vessels employed in the mail service under the provisions of this act shall be American-built steamships, owned and officered by American citizens, in conformity with the existing laws, or so owned and officered and registered according to law; and upon each departure from the United States the following proportion of the crew shall be citizens of the United States, to wit: During the first two years of such contract for carrying the mails, one-fourth thereof; during the next three succeeding years, one-third thereof, and during the remaining time of the continuance of such contract, at least one-half thereof; and shall be constructed after the latest and most approved types, with all the modern improvements and appliances for ocean steamers. They shall be screw steamships of iron or steel, and divided into the following classes according to gross registered tonnage and capacity to maintain at sea in ordinary weather the following speeds:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, on page 6, line 1, after the word "Postmaster-General," to strike out:

Provided further, That no steamships so employed and so paid for carrying the United States mail shall receive any other bounty or subsidy from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. FRYE. That provision occurs in another place in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 6, on page 7, line 8, after the words "one thousand," to strike out "five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

(b) On each entry, not exceeding 16 entries in any one fiscal year, and for a period of five years from the date of registration of a vessel of over 1,000 gross registered tons, which shall be completed and registered after the passage of this act, one-fourth of 1 cent per gross registered ton for each 100 nautical miles sailed, in addition to the compensation provided in paragraph (a).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, on page 8, line 8, in subdivision (e), after the article "A," to strike out "barge, canal boat, or;" so as to make the clause read:

(e) A vessel without motive power of its own, or a tugboat, or a vessel engaged in wrecking.

Mr. FRYE. I am not exactly satisfied with that amendment proposed in subdivision (e): "A barge, canal boat, or vessel without motive power of its own." There are some few barges which have small masts and small sails sufficient to keep their heads to the wind to provide for safety in case the tug breaks loose from them that might be counted to a certain extent "motive power of its own." I do not think there was any intention on the part of anybody to allow such barges to come in under this subsidy provision, and therefore I move to strike out subdivision (e), as it stands in the bill, and to insert as a substitute for it what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out subdivision (e) and in lieu thereof to insert:

(e) A barge, canal boat, or vessel proceeding from port to port in tow, or a tugboat or a vessel engaged in wrecking.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, it seems to me that the policy of protection has been beneficent in our country. I have no doubt that to-day industrially we have really no peer. Nearly every industry has been protected, has flourished, and is flourishing. One, and from a national point of view more important than any other, has for fifty years been without protection, compelled to compete with rivals protected. The logical result follows. With a seacoast of 10,000 miles, equipped with splendid harbors, with forests boundless, with iron and coal enough for the world, with sagacious, enterprising business men, with capital in great abundance, with skilled laborers, with a constantly increasing foreign commerce, we have permitted our rivals, our inferiors in almost all these regards, to seize upon the pathways of the great ocean to our almost utter exclusion.

Our foreign commerce last year amounted to two billion and a little over three hundred million dollars. We carried 8 and two-tenths per cent of it. Our exports last year amounted to $1,487,000,000. We carried 6 per cent of it under the American flag.

I saw a report made by the secretary of the Produce Exchange of New York a while ago—I have forgotten the year to which it applied—in which he showed that 55,764,000 bushels of grain were shipped that year from the port of New York to foreign ports and not a bushel on an American vessel.

I saw by a letter a while ago from our consul at Bergen, the principal port of Norway, that a little vessel, the Hamilton Fish, accidentally, I think, happened into that port, and the consul imposed certain fines and taxes which had several years before been repealed by Congress. His attention was called to it and he remitted the money. In the letter remitting it he says, "The fact that I have been consul here for fifteen years and that this is the only American vessel I have seen may be some excuse for my ignorance of the law."

Last year we reached the climax of our decadence. If you will examine the Report of Commerce and Navigation, you will find that there did not enter or clear a single American vessel from Germany, or Russia, or Sweden, or Norway, or Denmark, or the Netherlands, or Austria-Hungary, or Italy, or Greece, or Turkey; that 1 cleared from Belgium in ballast, 1 from Spain in ballast, and 2 from France, 1 of them in ballast.

Mr. President, it seems to me that that picture ought to humiliate and mortify beyond expression any patriotic citizen of the United States who glories in the power and prosperity of his country. It is not alone humiliating, it is absolutely dangerous. Suppose there is a European war; suppose Great Britain and Germany come to a conflict of arms; suppose those nations demand all the transports they can find, gathering them in from all over these lines that are now crossing and recrossing the Atlantic and Pacific, who is going to carry then your $1,487,000,000 of exports? Who is going to pay the increased war premiums on the insurance of the cargoes that are carried, if carried at all?

I say, Mr. President, in my opinion, the farmers, the manufacturers, and the wage workers of the United States would pay a penalty nearly, if not quite, equal to that paid by either of the contending parties. Now, what is the cause of this condition of things? There is only one—American wages. That is all there is to it. Nothing else has caused the condition of things which now exists. American wages increase the cost of our ships for the foreign trade at least 25 per cent.

I am as well aware as any other Senator can be that in the furnishing of raw materials to-day very likely we can supply them as cheaply as they can be supplied anywhere in the world; but the raw materials only furnish one half the cost of the ship; the construction of the ship is the other half. In that construction we pay the men who do the work twice the wages that are paid on the Clyde to-day; more than twice the wages that are paid in any German shipyard, and a good deal more than are paid in the shipyards of Norway. Our vessels to-day cost at least 25 per cent more than do those in any other country in the world.

Mr. Baker, of the American Transport Company, made a contract for eight ships abroad and six ships in American shipyards. He said he made that contract for ships in American shipyards because he believed that Congress was to do something for American shipping, and he wanted to try the experiment. He wrote a letter to the Commissioner of Navigation, in which he gave the cost of the ships he had contracted for abroad and the cost of those contracted for here. If you will examine that letter you will find from 20 to 25 per cent difference. That difference is illustrated over and over again wherever you can institute a comparison, and always with the same result.

But the question of wages on shipboard is infinitely more important than the additional cost of the ship. Take, for instance, the three ships, the St. Louis, the Oceanic, and the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. The monthly wages on the St. Louis—leaving out the master—for the master is not included in any of these comparisons, and there is more difference in the pay of the masters of American ships than there is in the pay of any other officers—the monthly wages on the St. Louis amount to $11,305; on the Oceanic, $9,890; on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, $7,715; but the Oceanic is a larger and faster ship than the St. Louis, and carries 47 more men; the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse is still larger, and carries 120 more men. Now, if you reduce the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse to the same size and speed as the St. Louis, and reduce the Oceanic to the same size and speed and the same number of men with the St. Louis, you will find that the German ship is running monthly on wages and food alone for one-half what it costs the St. Louis, and that the British ship has the advantage over the American ship of one-third.

Now, take the Pacific Mail Steamship Line. On the City of Sydney the monthly pay roll amounts to $3,675, while on a corresponding ship under the Chilean flag it is $1,480—more than twice greater on the American ship. Take the Pacific Mail steamship Peru, with monthly wages of $3,835, and the corresponding ship under the Chilean flag, with monthly wages of $1,726. Take the American ship Cherokee, sailing from New York to Santo Domingo, and the year's wages are $16,620, while on the British ship Cricket, of the same size, they are $10.219. Take the German ship Sonnigsberg, about the same size, and they amount to $7,500, less than one-half of the Cherokee. Take the Dutch ship Teutonic, and they amount to $6,643, in place of $16,620 on the Cherokee. Take the Norwegian ship Fortuna, and they amount to $6,128, instead of $16,620 on the Cherokee.

There is the story—not quite the whole story, but very nearly the whole of it. Any Senator can see that no American ship can by any possibility run in competition with those ships.

There is another thing to be reckoned with in considering this question. Of all the steamships in the world of 14 knots and upward, 80 per cent are subsidized by the countries whose flags they carry; of those of 16 knots and upward, all but six are heavily subsidized by the countries whose flags they carry.

Every Senator here knows that Great Britain commenced subsidizing over fifty years ago. He knows that Great Britain has persisted in it from the time it commenced down to now, never with a single cessation. Great Britain is reasonably wise in matters of that kind. Great Britain paid last year in postal subsidies, in admiralty subventions, and in retainers for sailors, a little over $6,000,000. France paid last year in admiralty subventions, retainers of sailors, bounty construction, and postal subsidies over $7,000,000. Germany, commencing only a short time ago to reach out into the markets of the world, paid over $2,000,000 last year, and has just established two lines to the East, heavily subsidized. Austria-Hungary paid $1,724,000. Spain paid to one single line $1,629,000. I think that has been reduced a little, but I could not succeed in finding out how much since she lost her colonies. Japan, a country which within a few years has sprung into life as one of the great countries of the world, paid last year $3,492,000, and the United States paid $998,000.

Now the question for us, it seems to me, is, Are we to submit to this humiliating and wretched condition of things? There is one reason beyond pride in country which I wish to suggest just at this moment. These nations have paid those postal subsidies for the purpose of establishing mail lines from their great commercial ports to the commercial ports of the world. For what purpose? For purposes of trade, and for nothing else.

Trade can not precede the mail. The mail must precede the trade—and they paid over $25,000,000 last year for postal subsidies for one single purpose, and that was to put themselves in a position to dispose of their surplus products in the markets of the world.

Mr. President, there is not a nation on this earth that needs markets for surplus products more than does the United States of America. The year before Mr. McKinley became President of the United States our exports amounted to $882,000,000. Last year they amounted to $1,487,000,000, nearly double. The year before Mr. McKinley became President of the United States our exports of manufactured products amounted to $228,000,000. Last year they amounted to $412,000,000, nearly double. And that increase of product is to go on year by year, year by year. Suppose you do not find markets for your increased product. Suppose you find yourself with a surplus on hand which you can not sell. Then stagnation; capital without profit, wage-workers without pay.

Is there anyone who for a single moment would dream that it is profitable for us in endeavoring to find those markets to seek them through our enemies in trade? Suppose there is a merchant in the city. Would you dream that that merchant for a moment would think of hiring the commercial agent of a rival house to find markets for his goods? Is there a Senator who doubts that an American ship, commanded by intelligent, active, earnest, interested American officers, is a better instrument for the distribution of our products abroad and for the finding of those markets than a German ship, officered by Germans, Germany being the dangerous rival of the United States of America in all this business for the next twenty-five years?

What can we do? What ought we to do? Some of our friends on the other side, and there is an amendment to that effect, think that free ships constitute the remedy; and yet the same Senators who say that free ships are the remedy insist that we can build ships just as cheaply as they can be built anywhere else. Then what would be the benefit of free ships? If, on the other hand, our contention is right, that ships cost 25 per cent more here than they do abroad, then what would free ships do? They would close every shipyard in the United States against ever building any ships for the foreign trade. There would be your standstill. They would be confined to building coastwise vessels alone.

I notice that Mr. Baker, the president of the American Transport Line, building the ships in the United States of which I spoke a few moments ago, a week or two ago had a letter in the New York Times, and he informed the public in that letter that he was building some ships here; and in the same letter he said that if Congress did not encourage American shipping he could not run those ships under the American flag and should not; that he would be obliged to put them under a foreign flag.

I assert without fear of contradiction that you can not find an intelligent man in the United States of America who will put his money into a foreign ship and have it admitted to American register to-day and then undertake to sail it in competition with the vessels that I have described here, with their wages.

Some have suggested bounties, but they are clearly repugnant to the Constitution and in violation of 24 treaties. I think that contention has practically been given up.

Some suggest discriminating duties because they worked well in the early days of the Republic. But to avail ourselves of discriminating duties we must abrogate, and abrogate ruthlessly, 34 commercial treaties with all the nations in the world. These nations of the world are to-day looking jealously at us, and it is said, I do not know whether true or not, that they are studying the problem how on earth they can stop us from getting into foreign markets. Do you not suppose if we should abrogate all those 34 treaties they would take it as an excuse, and would it not be a good excuse, for retaliation? In the early days there was no chance for retaliation. You had no exports. They were all imports. When France only a few years ago undertook to put on a discriminating duty, even we here, through President Grant proposed to retaliate, and other nations proposed to retaliate, and France at once withdrew from the position which she occupied.

In my opinion—and I can not help thinking it is entirely unselfish, because I do not own a single cent's interest in a ship in the whole world, nor any stock in any ship corporation in the world, nor do I ever expect to. I did a few years ago own an interest in a schooner. I had not heard from the ship for some time, and I saw that the value of schooners had gone up some, and I wrote the agent to sell immediately. He wrote me that she had run on the rocks three years before and was a total loss, without insurance.

That ended my connection with ship property. I say I do not consider it selfish when I say that in my opinion there is only one way in which you can accomplish anything in the direction suggested, and that is by paying out of the Treasury of the United States annually a sum of money which shall be equal to the difference between operating and carrying on of trade in foreign ships and carrying it on in our own ships. You do it in every single industry in this country. You have done it for years. The Republican party has stood by the idea of protection and encouragement ever since it has been a party in power. How can the Republican party excuse itself for leaving entirely unprotected an industry here as important as any of them, and why should the word "subsidy" terrify the people of this country, especially United States Senators? It is only another name for protection.

Now, in my judgment, we should do what other nations have done; first, provide for the United States mail from our commercial ports to the commercial ports of the world.

In 1891, after spending a long while in considering a bill—at least six months—in the consideration of which I sent all over the country for experts, because it was absolutely necessary to adjust rates and classifications so that encouragement sufficient should be given to establish mail routes, the Committee on Commerce authorized me to report to the Senate a postal subsidy bill. I did. It was discussed in the Senate. It was passed without amendment. It had four classes of ships—four different rates of pay.

It came back from the House on the last day and in almost the last hour of the session, amended by reducing the rates one-third. It was too late for a conference. Under the advice of friends the bill was accepted. It was a dead failure. We succeeded in getting one new line under it, but only by admitting two foreign-built ships to American registry through an agreement that the American line would build two more here. That line received a contract under that law, and it never has made one single cent of profit from the day it took the contract up to the present on its four ships. On the contrary, if it had remained under a foreign flag and the other two ships had been built in a foreign country and had gone under a foreign flag, that company, with those four ships, would have been $136,000 better off every year than it has been under the postal contract of 1891. No other line was built. There was no other competition.

I had every reason to believe if that bill passed the House as it passed the Senate there would be a line to Brazil; that there would be at least two lines on the Pacific Ocean, and one or two lines on the northern Atlantic. It failed utterly to produce any of those lines. It saved one or two small lines from bankruptcy.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. How did that bill as it passed the Senate, so far as that phase of the case is concerned, compare with the present bill?

Mr. FRYE. I will reach that point before I get through, if the Senator will pardon me for not answering the inquiry now.

Now, the experience of ten years and over has clearly proved that the rates of that act in respect to the higher-powered ships are insufficient. In the bill which is now before the Senate you are simply asked to put them back practically where they were when that bill passed the Senate. That is all.

So far as the postal subsidy law is concerned, section 1 of the existing law is amended only in these particulars: It changes the word "empowered" to "directed." The friends of this bill did not propose that the Postmaster-General should be at liberty to make contracts with foreign ships for carrying the United States mail if he desired to do so. They proposed to direct him to make his advertisements and issue his proposals in accordance with the purpose.

The maximum limit of the contract period in existing law is ten years. That has been changed in this bill to fifteen years. It has been changed because Germany in her last two contracts has made them for fifteen years and France in her great contract has made it for fifteen years. Great Britain generally makes it for ten years, but in one or two cases makes it annually.

Then the words are inserted "having regard to the national defense." As the law itself showed that it had regard to the national defense, it was thought better to put in the words. You will see that it leaves the Postmaster-General at entire liberty to reject any bid whatever if he does not consider it reasonable. It also leaves him to make a contract for a period of time anywhere from five to fifteen years. He is not obliged, notwithstanding we have changed the maximum to fifteen, to make the contract for fifteen years. Those are all the changes made in that section.

Section 2 of the old law I have before me. That requires him, and it has not been changed, to give notice in the daily papers of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, Charleston, Norfolk, Savannah, Galveston, and Mobile, and when the proposed service is to be on the Pacific Ocean in San Francisco, Tacoma, and Portland. It goes on to say how he shall describe the routes and what requirements will be made. That is the law to-day, and it has not been changed. It is what you do with respect to star routes and what you do in the coastwise service.

Under section 3 of the existing law there are four classes: 8,000-ton steamships, 20 knots; 5,000-ton steamships, 16 knots; 2,500-ton steamships, 14 knots; wooden steamers, 12 knots, and paddle-wheel steamers can be used on anything below 16 knots, according to existing law.

Now, that classification was not scientific, and for this reason: Take a 16-knot ship, and she will take 48 men to handle her coal. She will require about 140 tons of coal a day. Each man is able to handle 3 tons of coal. That is the basis on which they figure when they hire the crew. But take a 20-knot ship, and she requires twice as much coal, and more, too, and twice as many men.

Therefore the committee believed that to make a scientific classification you should recognize the very great difference in cost as you increase the power knot by knot. So in this bill instead of four classes the committee have made seven classes, knot by knot, and they have cut out entirely side-wheel steamers, because no longer would a side-wheel steamer be regarded as fit for carrying the United States mail, across the ocean at any rate. It might do for carrying the mail on some of the shorter routes, and under the general subsidy law the Postmaster-General is given the right to have them carry the mail for nothing where there are no provisions for regular mail lines. They have taken out also the 1,000-ton steamships. They, of course, have gone by.

Section 4 is simply amended by inserting "fourth and fifth classes," which it is necessary to insert because there is nothing of the kind in the existing law.

Section 5 relates to the compensation, and you have heard as to the compensation as provided for in this bill. It commences with 20 knots and upward and goes down to and includes the 14-knot steamship.

In adjusting these rates I endeavored to have them so fixed that, take them as a whole, they would not be quite so high as those contained in the bill which passed the Senate, but in the higher-powered vessels would be a little higher, as a matter of course, than in the existing law, because the existing law in that regard has proved itself a failure.

Mr. ALLISON. Can the Senator now state how this compensation will compare for the same class of work with that in the bill which we considered during the last session of Congress?

Mr. FRYE. The compensation is less than it was in that bill, and taking the general subsidy law and all the probable expenditures of the Government under this bill, the amount will not in the next five years be two-thirds of what it would have been under that bill.

Mr. MONEY. Six million dollars?

Mr. FRYE. In the next five years it would not probably be $6,000,000.

Mr. TELLER. Every year?

Mr. FRYE. Yes. That is, you would not reach $6,000,000 in five years, probably.

Mr. HANNA. You would not reach half of it.

Mr. FRYE. I will come to that before I get through.

Now, there is another change here which I regard as somewhat important in the interest of the American people. The existing law establishes rates only in relation to the power—that is, as to the speed. This bill establishes rates as to gross tonnage and speed. Now, what is that for? That is to encourage the largest possible ship. What for? To produce the lowest possible freight.

Now, the requirements of the old law are of course retained in this bill. Sections 6 and 7 of the existing law are as follows:

SEC. 6. That upon each of said vessels the United States shall be entitled to have transported free of charge a mail messenger, whose duty it shall be to receive, sort, take in charge, and deliver the mails to and from the United States, and who shall be provided with suitable room for the accommodation of himself and the mails.

SEC. 7. That officers of the United States Navy may volunteer for service on said mail vessels, and, when accepted by the contractor or contractors, may be assigned to such duty by the Secretary of the Navy whenever, in his opinion, such assignment can be made without detriment to the service, and while in said employment they shall receive furlough pay from the Government and such other compensation from the contractor or contractors as may be agreed upon by the parties: Provided, That they shall only be required to perform such duties as appertain to the merchant service.

Section 8 is the existing law, simply amended by using the word "such" instead of "that said," and also by adding, after the word "seamanship" the words "or engineering." It requires them to take one apprentice for every thousand tons, and to educate them and train them, not only in seamanship, but in engineering, as engineering now is getting to be about as important as seamanship. Then it provides that such steamers shall be taken by the United States as transports, etc.

Now, those are all of the changes that are made in the existing law in relation to the postal subsidy. If under this bill the Postmaster-General could contract for an 8,000-ton ship as he could under the old one at 20 knots an hour, the rate in this bill would be about 30 cents less than under the existing law. For 10,000 tons, about 30 cents more, because, as I said a moment ago, we provided in this bill that the rate shall not depend upon power alone, but upon gross tonnage as well. So as you increase your gross tonnage you increase of course the amount of money to be paid.

There are certain contracts which can not be affected by this bill at all. For instance, take the contract with the American Line. It expires, I believe, in 1905.

Mr. ALLISON. Can it be renewed?

Mr. FRYE. No.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to ask the Senator whether it is not true that whenever the contract does expire, then the provisions of this bill will apply, of course?

Mr. FRYE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator simply means that where any contracts have already been executed they will stand under the existing law, and so soon as they expire then the new law will apply to them.

Mr. FRYE. If they succeed in getting the contract.

Mr. CLAY. So I understand.

Mr. FRYE. They must do that. The payments of the United States to steamship companies for the transportation of ocean mails during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1901, were $1,826,046, divided as follows (Report of the Superintendent of Mails, p. 10):

	American steamers.	Foreign steamers.
Trans-Atlantic	$528,537	$465,807
Trans-Pacific	264,180	50,707
Miscellaneous	457,664	59,151
Total	1,250,381	575,665

For the current fiscal year the estimates of expenditures for the same purpose are:

Contracts under act of 1891	$1,448,968
American vessels not under contract	234,909
Total American vessels	1,683,877
Foreign vessels	633,233
Total	2,317,110

The contracts covered in the foregoing estimates in the order of their magnitude are:

1. American Line, 52 trips, New York-Southampton	$757,328
2. Oceanic (Spreckles), 17 trips, San Francisco-Australia	283,203
3. New York and Cuba Mail, 52 trips, New York-Habana-Mexico	130,104
4. Admiral Line, 104 trips, Boston, Philadelphia, Jamaica	123,569
5. Red D, 36 trips, New York-Venezuela	81,288
6. New York and Cuba Mail, 52 trips, New York-Habana	73,467

This bill does not affect any of those contracts. The contract with the American Line will expire in 1905, October 11. It might be affected in this way: If the Postmaster-General should decide to do what I sincerely hope he will provide for—a semi-weekly mail instead of weekly mail—if these gentlemen became successful bidders on the proposals issued by the Postmaster-General, it would increase the subsidy paid to them quite largely.

The contract with the Spreckles Line will not expire until October 31, 1910, and of course no change will be made there unless the Postmaster-General should determine to double the service. The contract with the Admiral Line expires December 31, 1909. The contract with the Red D Line, I understand, was renewed last month. It expired February 28, the last day of the month, and I understand it has just been renewed. It will be good for ten years, and will not be affected.

The contracts with the New York and Cuba Mail Steamship Company for the mail service to Habana and to Mexico will expire on October 31, 1902, and should the bill become a law these are the only existing contracts to be renewed in the near future.

Now, if this bill should become a law, what do I hope will be the result?

Mr. ALDRICH. Before the Senator passes from that point, would it interrupt him to ask him what the Government would have to pay next year to existing lines for carrying the mails if the bill should go into effect at once?

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator mean for lines that run under contract?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. Did I give it there?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think the Senator stated what the additional cost would be to the Government. I think the Senator did not state that amount.

Mr. HANNA. For the same service?

Mr. ALDRICH. For the same service.

Mr. FRYE. Contracts under the act of 1891 amounted to $1,448,000.

Mr. ALDRICH. What would it cost under this bill for the same service next year?

Mr. FRYE. That I can not tell, because there is such a great variety of vessels employed in the service. They can not be changed the next year, the Senator sees.

Mr. CLAY. I will ask the Senator from Maine to permit me a question.

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. Is it not true that for the large steamers with a high speed the price will be increased about 32 per cent in comparison with the existing law for carrying the mails? I think you will find in the report of the majority of the committee and in the tables of the Commissioner of Navigation the exact amount that it will be increased.

Mr. FRYE. Below 16 knots there could not be any increase over the present law. Indeed, the price would be lower than the present law. The lower-powered vessels received more than it was necessary to pay. Higher-powered vessels did not receive so much as was necessary. Quite a number of contracts made with the low-powered classes have been made for considerable less than the maximum amount named in the existing law.

Here is an illustration: Under the present law a 20-knot steamer of 8,000 tons is entitled to $4 per statute mile, while under this bill such a vessel would be entitled to $3.20—that is, 80 cents less. Of course, the Postmaster-General would not accept for a mail route from New York to Southampton a vessel of less than 10,000 tons under any circumstances. I suppose they would go over that.

Mr. HANNA. Is that a 20-knot ship?

Mr. FRYE. Yes; a 20-knot ship. Under the existing law he had a right to take an 8,000-ton ship of 20 knots, but he did have 10,000-ton ships. The St. Louis is 11,629 tons. If he took an 8,000-ton ship under the present bill it would be 80 cents less per hundred miles than under the existing law. A 10,000-ton steamer of that speed is now under the law entitled to $4, while under this bill it would receive $4.70. The St. Louis, 11,629 gross tons, for example, is now paid at the rate of $14,564 per voyage, while under this bill the maximum allowance would be $19,881.

Broadly speaking, all the mail steamers, 14 knots or over, of 7,000 tons or over, may be paid at higher rates than under the present law, except 20-knot steamers under 10,000 tons. Steamers of 4,000, 5,000, and 6,000 tons are to be paid at rates not differing greatly from those payable under the present law.

Generally the rates proposed by the bill are lower than those contemplated in the bill which passed the Senate in 1891, with occasional exceptions of steamers of much greater tonnage and speed than had then been built. The changes are based on the demonstrated fact that the act of 1891, as amended by the House, did not provide high enough rates for the higher, larger, and faster steamers; that the rates for large steamers of lower speed are insufficient, and that the rates for smaller and slower steamers are higher than necessary.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. VEST. I wish to ask the Senator, with his permission, if the report of the majority of the committee and the annual report of the Commissioner of Navigation do not estimate that the effect of this bill will be to increase the subsidy annually from nine hundred and ninety-odd thousand dollars—nearly $1,000,000—to $4,700,000?

Mr. FRYE. If it did not increase it to that extent in time, the Senator from Missouri would never find me advocating the bill.

Mr. VEST. Then the Senator says it does?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly it would if successful.

Mr. VEST. Then in order to get rid of all this, what I may call, with great respect, circumlocution, I ask the Senator if that is not the estimate, that $4,700,000 is the minimum, being three hundred and odd thousand dollars more than the subsidy now paid by Great Britain?

Mr. FRYE. I was going to show that without any circumlocution at all.

Mr. VEST. That is what I want.

Mr. FRYE. I was beginning to show that when the Senator interrupted me. I was saying what I was hoping would be accomplished by this bill.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I wish the Senator would tell us exactly how this calculation is made, whether it is made upon the number of ships now in existence and likely to take the benefit of this act, or do you calculate upon some new ships? How is that?

Mr. FRYE. That I will come to before I get through. What I expect to accomplish by this bill is, first, a fortnightly service from San Francisco, by way of Honolulu, to Yokohama, Nagasaki, Shanghai, and Hongkong, with connections to Manila, about 625 miles distant. In time, if not at the outset, the steamers should be 18-knot steamers of about 12,000 tons, superior in speed and tonnage to the best steamers on the Asiatic routes of the Peninsula and Oriental, Canadian Pacific, North German Lloyd, Messageries Maritimes, or Nippon Yusen companies. The service would employ constantly five steamers, and a sixth would be necessary in reserve. They would cost $12,000,000 at least. The distance for the round voyage is approximately 15,000 miles, including the detour to Hawaii each way. The maximum per voyage under the bill would be $41,400 or, for a fortnightly service, $1,076,400 a year.

Next, a fortnightly service, alternating with the first one, from Puget Sound ports directly to Japan, Shanghai, and Hongkong, connecting with Manila. The steamers should be of the same size, 12,000 gross tons, as on route A; but as the omission of Honolulu will lead to a saving of over 1,000 miles each way, such steamers may be of 17 knots and yet maintain a joint schedule with line A. The distance for this round voyage is approximately 12,600 miles, and the maximum per voyage would be $31,752, or for the fortnightly service a year $825,552. The effectual performance of this contract would require six steamers, costing about $11,000,000 to build. There would be an expenditure of $23,000,000 in American shipyards and wages paid to American workmen.

Next, a fortnightly service from San Francisco, by way of Honolulu and Pago Pago, to Australia. The present contract with the Oceanic (Spreckels) Company provides for 17 voyages, and 9 additional voyages by similar vessels would involve an additional expense of $150,000, or, for the fortnightly service, $433,000. It would require two additional steamers.

The total amount involved in the three propositions is $2,335,000 per annum.

Mr. ALDRICH. All new?

Mr. FRYE. All new; a weekly mail service to Hawaii; a weekly mail service to the Philippines; a weekly mail service to Japan, China, and Hongkong; a fortnightly mail service to our Samoan possessions, and a fortnightly mail service to New Zealand and Australia.

The American ocean mail system for the United States outlined will render the United States as independent as is Great Britain of all foreign powers for mail connections with the principal ports of the commercial world. The new routes proposed, together with the routes now in existence through contracts under the act of 1891, which are not for some years subject to modification, with the maximum cost of each, may be thus summarized:

Semiweekly to Jamaica, $123,569; semiweekly to Habana, $73,000; weekly to Mexico, $130,000; semiweekly to Southampton—that is what I hope to accomplish, if this bill becomes a law, instead of a weekly service—semiweekly to Southampton, $1,713,000.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from Maine be good enough to say how many steamers leave the port of New York alone for Southampton and Liverpool every day?

Mr. FRYE. I have not the slightest idea.

Mr. MONEY. It is a good deal over one?

Mr. FRYE. I do not know.

Mr. MONEY. I would further ask, then, why subsidize lines where we have more than one steamer a day leaving port for that very port?

Mr. FRYE. I want an American ship to leave it.

Mr. MONEY. But all this steamship business is for the promotion of American commerce. That we recognize as important. In fact, the only object of this part of the bill is to recompense the ship for conveying the commerce of the world. Then what benefit do we do our trade and commerce to delay it a day or two in order to get it through an American ship? Will the Senator explain that?

Mr. FRYE. I should not exactly like to explain that at this moment. I would rather go on with my statement now.

Mr. MONEY. I am sorry to have interrupted the Senator. I presumed he was prepared on that line.

Mr. FRYE. Once in ten days to Venezuela, $81,000, and fortnightly to Brazil (that I had not mentioned before), $243,000. That is on the Atlantic, and the total expense on the Atlantic would be $2,365,400.

Pacific Ocean.

Weekly to Manila Weekly to Japan, China, Hongkong Weekly to Hawaii		$1,901,952
Fortnightly to Pago Pago Fortnightly to Australia		433,000
Pacific total		2,334,952
Making in all for postal subsidies		4,700,352

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator tell us how much we pay now under existing law? I thought I had the figures.

Mr. FRYE. One million four hundred thousand dollars; in that neighborhood.

Mr. CLAY. One million four hundred thousand dollars?

Mr. FRYE. That is my recollection.

Mr. ALDRICH. One million four hundred thousand dollars for an entirely different service, I will say.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but before he gets through I want to get clearly in my mind how much new shipping it is proposed to get, say, on the Asiatic Sea, under this bill; and I should like to know how much we shall get on the Atlantic. Whether we are to have new ships or whether we are to subsidize those already in existence is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. FRYE. The only line where there could be increased service would be the Spreckels line east to Australia. All the rest would be necessarily new ships. I propose to mention a little further along what will be done. I stated that the ships which would be required to be built in American shipyards would amount to $24,000,000 in value.

Mr. TELLER. For the Asiatic trade?

Mr. FRYE. For the Asiatic trade. That did not include the line to Brazil nor the semiweekly from New York to Southampton. If you made it semiweekly, five more ships from New York to Southampton would have to be put on. They would probably cost a couple of million dollars apiece. We require them to be of 20 knots and all that sort of thing. In the South American trade it would probably take four ships, and they would cost, perhaps, $1,000,000 apiece.

Now, it must be remembered that the sum paid for the transportation of mails by sea last year was $1,921,839. Nearly $2,000,000 was paid last year for the transportation of our mails. Other items for the service mentioned by the Superintendent of Foreign Mails bring the total up to $2,062,537. The amount of postage collected in this service is estimated at $3,005,323, making a profit on the foreign service last year of $942,786.

Assuming the American system outlined above to have been in force at a maximum cost of $4.700,000, or practically $2,800,000 greater than the amount actually paid for the transportation of mails by sea last year, and assuming receipts from postage to have been the same, say $3,000,000 a year, our ocean mail service, instead of a profit of $942,786, would show a deficit against the Government of $1,800,000.

Great Britain's loss in carrying the mails under her postal system is a little over $2,000,000; ours would be $1,800,000. Now, that is providing you have all the routes that I have been talking about, and then further providing that every route is let at the maximum price. But on the Pacific Ocean there is going to be a very sharp competition when the Postmaster-General issues his proposals there for ships. There are men standing ready to make their bids, and I have no doubt at all that it will be less than the maximum cost on the Pacific Ocean. We have enormous advantages there that we do not have on the Atlantic Ocean.

I believe this is all I have to say at the present moment about the postal subsidy part of the bill. I wish to say, however, speaking about a deficit of, say, $1,800,000, and this cost of $4,700,000, of course next year there would not be any of it. We could not build a ship next year; so that there would be no increase at all. It would undoubtedly take three years, and possibly four or five years, to build the ships necessary to receive the $4,700,000. I presume it could not be done under four years, because every one of the ships has to be built; and there would be an expenditure of between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000 in our shipyards in building them.

So as far as next year is concerned, no one need worry about paying anything out under this postal subsidy bill.

Next is Title II, the general subsidy. Now, that does not need much explanation from me. Every Senator knows what a general subsidy is, and I believe that this bill is so drafted that anybody on earth on reading it can understand it. I do not think there is anything that can not be understood readily.

The bill provides for a general subsidy of 1 cent per ton every hundred miles. The bill at the last session provided 1¼ cents for the first 1,500 miles and 1 cent for the distance sailed beyond. It has all the provisions that were contained in the other bill in relation to what it should carry and all that sort of thing, and about apprentices, and about use by the United States in time of war, and all of the provisions——

Mr. DOLLIVER. Not to disturb the Senator, I find a little difficulty in interpreting lines 23, 24, and 25, at the bottom of page 6, the description of the ships that are contemplated by the act.

Mr. FRYE (reading):

> And being at the time of entry engaged in the foreign trade of the United States, which shall be entered in the United States from a foreign port or from any port in the Philippine Islands, compensation as hereinafter provided.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. That simply provides that the ships shall be American-registered vessels, American-built vessels. Under the old bill there was a large number of foreign vessels.

Mr. DOLLIVER. It seems to be provided for above, that they shall be duly registered by citizens of the United States. This seems to be an additional description.

Mr. FRYE. They could not receive a subsidy unless at the time they were engaged in carrying goods from foreign countries. That is all that that means. If they were coasting they could not receive any subsidy. They must be engaged at the time the subsidy is paid in carrying American products to foreign lands.

The exclusions in this bill are the same as they were in the bill at the last session, practically. The cost of the general subsidy of course can not be made exact, but you can arrive at it pretty nearly. The Commissioner of Navigation took all the ships engaged in the foreign carrying trade for the year 1900, and in his annual report for that year gave all of the voyages which they made. Then to ascertain what would be paid the next year, for instance under this bill if it became a law, he figured out this subsidy on all of those voyages, and it amounted, in round numbers, to $1,000,000. But, as the report of the Postmaster-General shows, that $1,000,000 should be credited with $213,000, which was paid for carrying the United States mail, because this bill provides that it shall be carried for nothing outside of the regular contract mail line. So it would leave it about $800,000.

Then the question of course came up as to what increase would be likely to be made. You increase sailing ships 40,000 tons in a year. That is a very large amount. Even with all my optimism it is more than I should dare to hope for. But suppose you increase sailing ships 40,000 tons next year. They would receive $100,000 as a subsidy under this general subsidy bill, and that is all.

I ought to mention one thing here. In order to afford some encouragement to build new ships there is a provision in the bill that ships built hereafter, after this becomes a law, might, for five years, receive a quarter of a cent extra. Now, take the quarter of a cent extra and build the 40,000 tons of sailing ships and it would cost you $100,000 a year. Suppose you constructed 200,000 tons of steamships next year, which is a very large amount—more than our shipyards can take care of at present.

Mr. HANNA. Very much more.

Mr. FRYE. But suppose you built 200,000 tons next year, it would only increase your subsidy $1,300,000, allowing that each steamship will make 50,000 miles a year, and the world's experience shows that no steamship can make more than that. Allow that she makes 50,000 miles a year, your subsidy for the 200,000 tons would be $1,300,000, and the next year 200,000 tons would be $1,300,000 more, and you would be spending about $40,000,000 in American shipyards in the two years.

Now, suppose you enact this bill into a law and you accomplish what I am suggesting may be accomplished—all of these lines on the Pacific, a line to South America, a semiweekly line from New York to Southampton, 40,000 tons of sailing vessels built next year, 200,000 tons of steamships built next year—you have in the entire expenditure $4,700,000, $1,300,000 added is $6,000,000, and $100,000 added is $6,100,000, the most that can by possibility be reached within the next five years. You have, to offset it, the carrying of the mails of the United States, for which the Government receives $3,000,000, so that you would practically in five years just about cut in two the expenses of the Government for this purpose.

Mr. HANNA. The mails would increase.

Mr. FRYE. The mails would increase, and all that sort of thing. There is no doubt about that. That does not seem to me to be a very serious proposition to the United States Senate, which in fifteen minutes' time will vote to build a warship that costs $5,000,000; it does not seem to me to be a very serious thing for a legislative body that will pass a river and harbor bill, as it ought to, carrying $50,000,000.

I want to call your attention to another thing. There was previously complaint made that in the bill which was before Congress at the last session provision was made for the making of contracts which lasted thirty years, and Senators figured that it would cost anywhere from $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 to meet those contracts. This bill provides for no contracts. The only contracts are postal subsidy contracts in the general subsidy law, and the Congress of the United States can repeal it at the very next session if it pleases. It is left entirely in the power of Congress to deal with this general subsidy as it pleases. If it works well, as I hope it may, I know that Congress will not repeal it; if it works badly, I know that Congress ought to repeal it or amend it. It is in the power of Congress to do either without any contracts to bind us in any possible direction.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. What additional guaranty is there in the provision of the bill that Congress can at any time repeal this act? Can any Congress bind a subsequent Congress in such fashion as to make it mandatory and entirely obligatory that legislation shall continue?

Mr. FRYE. Senators on that side, in discussing the bill which was before Congress at the last session, very clearly held to the opinion that there were contracts therein provided for which very likely Congress might repeal, but that the United States would be liable in the Court of Claims for violating a contract which it had made.

Mr. VEST. That is a new proposition to me. I engaged in the debate on the bill to which the Senator refers, in the Fifty-sixth Congress, and as it was originally introduced there was a distinct limitation that the subsidy should never exceed $9,000,000 a year for twenty years. Afterwards, during the stress of debate and opposition—that opposition coming principally from the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]—the amount of subsidy was reduced, and my recollection is that we reduced the time from twenty to fifteen years, making the total amount, according to my calculation, $135,000,000 instead of $180,000,000.

I will ask the Senator from Maine if, under this bill, there is any limitation at all upon the general subject, unless you call it a limitation that a subsequent Congress may repeal the act, or, as the Senator suggests, amend it. I have never before heard the suggestion that the Court of Claims could take cognizance of such a matter. If the Congress of the United States at any time sees proper to repeal any act, it does not make the Government liable in the Court of Claims. That is a constitutional power which can not be taken away; otherwise, under that assertion of power, one Congress could legislate for all eternity, and no subsequent Congress could repeal its action.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I understood that by the last bill, the one to which the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has referred, we were undertaking to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into contracts. Certainly it is within the power of the Congress to authorize a representative of the Government to bind the Government by contractual obligations. One Congress can not, of course, bind a subsequent Congress not to repeal an act, but if the Congress authorizes a representative of the Government to make a contract on behalf of the Government, and a subsequent Congress sees fit to repeal the act under which the contract has been made, that contract remains binding, I suppose, until its full performance. That is all that I understood the Senator from Maine to refer to.

Mr. FRYE. That is all I did say.

Mr. VEST. With the permission of the Senator from Maine, I will say that the Senators from Maine and Ohio know very well that the subsidy in the bill before the Fifty-sixth Congress did not rest entirely on contract. If I had brought to the United States a foreign-built vessel which I had purchased with my money in England, and put it under American registry, had that bill become a law I should have received one-half the subsidy without any contract; and if, after the passage of that bill, an American citizen should build a ship and put it under American registry no contract with the Secretary of the Treasury was necessary in order to receive the subsidy. There was no postal contract provided for in the bill of the last Congress. This feature now comes here for the first time since 1891. I refer to the postal subsidy. There was no contract about it. It was just simply a naked, bald subsidy. A foreign-built ship brought here under American registry would have received one-half, and if built in this country it would have received for a number of years the full subsidy.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Missouri is entirely mistaken; but I do not care to go into that subject now.

Mr. VEST. Very well.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I think that is rather an important question to have settled now. As I understood the projected bill in the last Congress authorized and directed the Secretary of the Treasury to make contracts, but he could not make contracts except for a stipulated period. A foreign vessel admitted to our registry, as I understood it, could not receive subsidy unless its owners entered into a contract with the Secretary of the Treasury, and by its provisions the bill was practically to expire in thirty years.

Mr. CLAY. In twenty years.

Mr. ALLISON. Well, I will say twenty years; but, of course, a contract could be made within ten years from the passage of the act, and when that contract was made it might last for twenty years. Therefore I say that by the terms of that law the subsidy in its general operation could continue for thirty years and no longer. So I am compelled to disagree with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] in the statement that that provision of the law had no limitation. As I understand, this bill has a limitation with respect to contracts for mail service; but there is no limitation respecting the second clause of the bill, and I understand the Senator from Maine in charge of the bill to say that, because of the provision that the next Congress can repeal it, there is no obligation, moral or otherwise, resting upon the Government of the United States which will compel it to continue a contract for any particular period—that is to say, a shipbuilder who constructs a ship in view of this second proposition constructs it knowing at the time that the same authority which provides that subsidy can repeal it next year if it so chooses, and that the subsidy will only continue for a year if Congress shall at the expiration of that period change the law. If the bill does not clearly express that idea, I hope the Senator from Maine will propose apt words to do it.

Mr. FRYE. Certainly; the bill does it now.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I should like to inquire whether foreign-built ships can get the benefit of this subsidy at all?

Mr. FRYE. They can not, any of them.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I should like to know, also, whether ships which take the benefit of the postal subvention may also for the same voyages participate in the general subsidy?

Mr. FRYE. Not at all. The general provision in section 13 is:

> That a vessel shall not be entitled to compensation under two or more titles of this act at the same time.

That is on page 11. Section 14 contains this provision:

> That a vessel which has at any time received compensation pursuant to any of the provisions of this act shall not be sold, except by the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, to a citizen or subject of a foreign power, under penalty of forfeiture.

Various provisions in this bill refer to the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury, and therefore this last provision is made in section 15:

> That the President of the United States shall from time to time cause to be made, by the proper heads of departments, regulations for the due execution of the provisions of this act.

The Senators who have been occupying my place on the floor for the last ten or fifteen minutes have done it a great deal better and more creditably than I could, and therefore I was very glad to have them do it.

I do not know of anything more that it is necessary for me to say at the present time, but I sincerely hope that Senators who desire to speak in opposition to this bill will do so at as early a day as possible. I should like to have it disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Maine permit me to ask a question?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. By the provisions of the former bill, under an amendment, I think, it was required as to the tonnage subsidy that a ship should be required to carry at least 50 per cent cargo?

Mr. FRYE. Yes.

Mr. HARRIS. Is there any provision of that kind in this bill?

Mr. FRYE. No; the committee came to the conclusion that that was contrary to the Constitution and could not be put in; that it was indirectly a bounty, and in violation of 24 treaties. Very strong legal arguments were presented to the committee in that regard. Another thing, we put no limitation upon the amount which might be expended in one year. That was not put in, because Congress will have the matter in its own hands at any time.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Maine permit me to ask a question?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I understood the Senator to give us his estimate of the amount of work that would be done in American shipyards in the next and succeeding years. I want to ask the Senator for information—I presume he has it to give in this particular as well as in others—what is the truth with reference to the present occupation of the shipyards of this country in the construction of ships? Is it true that they are full of orders; or if not, to what extent are they employed?

Mr. FRYE. It is not true that they are full of orders. I do not say that of my own knowledge. I say it because I happened to see a letter written by Mr. Baker, of the American Transport Company, to the New York Times, perhaps about a week ago, in which he alluded to that very question as to what extent the yards were occupied, and he stated that they were not fully occupied at the present time.

Mr. BACON. The Senator, I understand, then, has no information of a detailed character, and he is acting simply upon the statements contained in one letter?

Mr. FRYE. That is all.

Mr. BACON. Has not the Senator frequently seen, within the past six or eight months—or several times, at any rate—publications in the newspapers giving most glowing accounts of the vast amount of work that our shipyards are now doing?

Mr. FRYE. I saw in the press this remarkable statement, that Mr. Furness, one of the great shipbuilders of Great Britain, had been over here for the last two months, and that he had made contracts for the construction of eight steamships in the United States yards, to be taken over to Great Britain; and the newspapers exultingly cried, "What is there in this talk about ships costing more here than they do abroad?" I immediately made inquiry, and I found that Mr. Furness had been over here and he had made contracts for the building of eight steamships over there. So I do not take much stock in what I hear regarding these matters.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator is perfectly familiar with this subject. I understood the Senator to state that the higher wages paid to American workmen is the great point in favor of the passage of this bill; that wages are higher in the United States than in foreign countries. I should like to ask him, is there any law now on our statute books requiring American shipowners, operating ships in foreign trade, to use American seamen as against foreign seamen? Is it not true that on our ships on the Pacific coast trading with China and Japan the very cheapest Chinese labor is used, and that about 72 per cent of the crews are comprised of Chinamen?

Mr. FRYE. There is no law now which requires American sailors to be employed on a ship. The law requires the officers, the watch officers, the engineers, and assistant engineers to be American citizens, but there is no requirement that the others shall be. In this bill, however, there is a requirement that one-fourth the first year shall be Americans, the next year one-third, and the next year one-half.

Mr. CLAY. Right there I will ask the Senator, is it not true that a careful examination of the wages paid on ships operated by foreigners with the wages paid on ships operated by American citizens under our flag shows that about 30 per cent of the crews receive the same wages? Is it not also true that an American shipowner under the provisions of this bill could employ Americans to constitute one-fourth of his crew, simply employing that class of sailors who receive the same pay here that they received abroad, then for the remainder of the crew employ foreigners? Consequently there would be no increase of wages under the provisions of the bill by the employment of Americans to constitute one-fourth of the crew.

Mr. FRYE. I am afraid the Senator never went to sea. You get common sailors; let a dozen Americans receive $30 a month, and a dozen Portuguese receive $20, and you would have a howling time on shipboard very shortly, I tell you. It is an absolute impossibility. It can not be done. Mr. Hill, who is building those two big ships at New London, speaking about the wages of the men on those two ships—I was there the other day—and he told me he was paying $1.75 a day for the commonest laborer. You can hire a common laborer on the Clyde and in Germany for 75 cents a day. It is all nonsense to say that an American ship can employ a sailor at any less than American wages. It can not be done, and the illustrations which I read here—and they are taken from the pay rolls—prove conclusively that it can not be done.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator mean to say when we hire Chinamen to work the ships between our Pacific coast and China and Japan, that we pay those Chinamen the same wages for the class of work they perform as we pay to American seamen?

Mr. FRYE. I do not know of any ship of that kind.

Mr. CLAY. I will state to the Senator that a few days ago, in the hearings before the Committee on Immigration, a captain in charge of a ship there, speaking against the passage of the Chinese-exclusion act, pointed out the fact that they used almost exclusively Chinese labor.

Mr. FRYE. Was that a sailing ship?

Mr. CLAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. I think very likely on sailing ships when they get over there they might employ Chinamen or anybody else.

Mr. CLAY. The captain went on to state that they employed Chinamen because they were sober, and because they received less wages than American seamen received.

Mr. HANNA. Was that an American ship?

Mr. CLAY. I think it was.

Mr. HANNA. I should like to take issue with that statement, and I should like to have the facts, if we are going to have this discussion, go into the RECORD. I should like to have the statement that was made and the name of that ship.

Mr. CLAY. I think I can furnish it. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that the statement was taken down at the time, and I know I was impressed by it. I for one could not understand why, if we used foreign labor in operating American ships, we could not compete with foreign ships using the same labor. I think I can produce the statement. I am sure I can.

Mr. HANNA. I do not know of any American ship engaged in the foreign trade on the Pacific Ocean except the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. Does the Senator know that they employ Chinese labor?

Mr. CLAY. I do not.

Mr. HANNA. That is the only steamship line on the Pacific Ocean in the foreign trade.

Mr. CLAY. I am informed that they do employ Chinese labor.

Mr. HANNA. I will ask the Senator from Georgia if he knows that?

Mr. CLAY. I do not.

Mr. FRYE. There is no law to prevent them from employing that kind of labor if they want to. Here is a law that will interfere with it if anything will; but the regular lines of steamships that we are talking about now do not change their crews every time they come in and go out; they retain the same crews practically year after year.

Mr. BACON. I will state to the Senator from Ohio that the Pacific Mail Steamship Company does employ Chinamen almost exclusively.

Mr. FRYE. There is no law to prevent that.

Mr. BACON. I do not know anything about the wages, but the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] knows the fact, as everybody does who has crossed the Pacific.

Mr. HANNA. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia in what capacity are those Chinese employed and what proportion of the crew is composed of Chinamen?

Mr. BACON. I did not count them, but I should say that, with the exception of the officers and the petty officers of the ship—and not all of them either; excluding those, although there were some Chinese among what I would call the petty officers, but I will not include any of them—outside of the officers and petty officers, I should say there was not one man in fifty on the ship on which I crossed, who was not either a Chinamen or a Japanese—not one in fifty, I believe. My distinguished friend on my right will know as to that.

Mr. CLAY. I will say that that statement corresponds with the statement of the captain of the ship who testified before the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I simply want to state that it is in the testimony, reduced to writing, before the Committee on Commerce that the wages on American ships is uniformly higher than the wages paid on like ships of other countries. For instance, take an American ship bound from New York to Australia, take an English ship, and take a Norwegian ship. The wages paid to seamen on the American ship is at least 30 per cent higher; and even then the Norwegian will not ship on an American vessel. That statement is in evidence before the Committee on Commerce, of which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] is a member. It was taken down in the investigation of this question at the last session. The wages paid on Norwegian ships are about 50 per cent of those paid on American ships.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator mean the investigation during this session of Congress?

Mr. ELKINS. No; at the last session. I produce that as one of the reasons why the expense of operating an American ship is much greater than operating a foreign ship. As to the question of Chinese labor, I shall not enter into that.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question relative to that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia if the statement he refers to related to all ships or merely to steamships engaged in any particular line?

Mr. ELKINS. The question was asked directly by me as to an American ship going to Australia, a Norwegian ship, and an English ship, and the answer was, that even when the food was better and the pay was better on the American ship the preference of the Norwegians and the English was for their own ships.

Mr. MALLORY. Ordinarily, on the American sailing ship——

Mr. ELKINS. This was a steamship, and the testimony was taken before the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator confines it to steamships?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MALLORY. I think it is a fact that the masters, engineers, and mates of American steamships receive higher wages than the corresponding officers on foreign ships, but when you come to the ordinary seamen, I think you will find that there is no difference whatever in the wages.

Mr. ELKINS. The Norwegians prefer their own ships.

Mr. MALLORY. The wages of the seamen are the same whether they be Norwegians, Swedes, or anybody else. It depends entirely upon the port from which they sail. But when you refer to the officers, I think it is a fact that an American captain gets considerably more than an English captain, an English captain gets considerably more than a French captain, and the French captain gets more than the Italian, Swede, or Norwegian.

Mr. ELKINS. The wages of Americans are 32 per cent more. That is in evidence before the Committee on Commerce, which has been reduced to print.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, is it proposed to go on with this debate to-night? I have no set speech to make upon this question——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, for consideration, and open to amendment or for remarks.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator from Missouri will be permitted to select his own time to make his speech.

Mr. VEST. As I have said, I have no set speech to make, but I simply want to deny some propositions advanced by my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I can go on and do so this afternoon or in the morning.

Mr. SPOONER. Which do you prefer?

Mr. VEST. It is now after 4 o'clock, and I presume there is some business to be done in executive session. If the Senator in charge of the bill is willing, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. VEST. I yield.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I stated to the Senate a few minutes ago that a captain in charge of a ship on the Pacific coast had testified before the Committee on Immigration that Chinese labor was used almost exclusively in our trade with China. I thought I was correct, but I sent and secured a copy of the testimony, from which I read the following:

Senator CLAY. Have you any idea about the per cent of foreigners in the crews employed by the shipping interests on the Pacific? Can you give a rough estimate of the percentage of the foreigners in the crews?

The CHAIRMAN. You mean outside of the Chinese?

Mr. SEABURY. Do you mean on my particular ship?

Senator CLAY. I mean on all ships.

Mr. SEABURY. Take the Pacific Coast Company's ships. An American firm runs from San Francisco to San Diego and from there away up to Alaska and away up to the Klondike. They ship white crews. I do not know whether they are Americans or not. The ships that go south of San Francisco are in ports every day; and if the sailors do anything that they should not do, they can put them ashore at any port.

Senator CLAY. Have you any idea about the percentage of Chinese in those crews?

Mr. SEABURY. We do not have any Chinese on any ships up and down the coast, only from China.

Senator CLAY. Well, from Hongkong?

Mr. SEABURY. There are only three American ships that can go in the Pacific Mail from San Francisco, and about two-thirds of their crews are Chinese. It is not two-thirds. There are about 100 to 105 Chinese, and the rest of the 164 are white.

Senator CLAY. Is there any material difference in the wages of a crew of foreigners and Americans?

Mr. SEABURY. We give the same to the foreigners that we do to the Americans. There is a difference in laborers.

Senator CLAY. About what is that difference? Have you any idea?

Mr. SEABURY. The Chinese we pay $15 a month and find them.

Representative KAHN. That is Mexican?

Mr. SEABURY. That is Mexican.

Representative KAHN. Seven dollars and a half.

Mr. SEABURY. Seven Mexican dollars and a half, and we feed them. In their own waters the Chinese Merchants' Company, two large lines there, pay them $12 and they find themselves. We pay them $3 more than they do and feed them. On the coast line I think it is $30 or $35. I can not tell you exactly.

Senator CLAY. What do you pay Americans?

Mr. SEABURY. When we did get them?

Senator CLAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SEABURY. Whatever the going wages is. I do not know. I suppose this gentleman [pointing to Mr. Furuseth] would know more about that.

Mr. FURUSETH. It would be $30 on steamers carrying white men to China, I should think.

I thought I was correct in my statement.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Georgia give the name of the witness?

Mr. CLAY. The name of the witness is Captain Seabury.

Mr. HANNA. Is he a captain in the Pacific Mail line?

Mr. CLAY. Yes, sir; he was.

Mr. HANNA. The Pacific Mail?

Mr. CLAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACON. I will state to the Senator that the captain whose name has just been read was captain of the steamship China, and has just been transferred and put in command of the new ship Korea.

I wish to state that Captain Seabury I know personally, and in view of his statement as to the proportion I was manifestly wrong in saying one in fifty. My statement was simply an estimate gathered from general observation in seeing men coming and going. There were doubtless many I never saw at all. I have no doubt that Captain Seabury's estimate of two-thirds is correct, and that my estimate was too high.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. VEST. I renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eighteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 4, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 3, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, February 28, was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HENRY of Mississippi, indefinitely, on account of important business.

RURAL FREE-DELIVERY SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. LOUD, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11728) to classify the rural free-delivery service and fix the compensation of employees thereof, with Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts in the chair.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, when it was agreed that this bill should be taken up for consideration to-day, it was also understood that the time should be equally divided between those who favor and those who oppose the passage of the pending bill.

I want to submit a proposition that the gentleman from California control the time in favor of the bill, and as I filed the minority report, that I may control the time on behalf of those who oppose the passage of the bill. I think, possibly, by that arrangement the time can be more equitably and evenly divided among the different persons who have views to express upon this question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia suggest any length of time for the general debate?

Mr. SWANSON. We have no desire for any conclusion of the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be divided between the opponents of the bill and those in favor of it, and that the gentleman from California control the time in favor of the bill and the gentleman from Virginia the time in opposition to it. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. 10308) to provide for a permanent Census Office.

RURAL FREE-DELIVERY SERVICE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, the House is now approaching a question, of course not comparable in importance with a question of ways and means of government, or the question of the government of the Philippine Islands, or the policy of a party, but yet I believe it is approaching a question which, perhaps unfortunately—and I lay due emphasis upon the word "unfortunately"—affects individual members, and according to the views of the average individual member affects him far more greatly than any question which will come before this House at this session of Congress. I believe myself that it is the most important question that will come before this Congress, or the next, or the next.

From a financial standpoint, this House, I believe, to-day will determine whether this service shall cost us a possible $60,000,000 a year or a possible $20,000,000 a year, and I think I am not asking too much of the House when I ask that it give this question that close, high public consideration which I believe it deserves, because as you determine it here to-day, so it must be determined for all time, come weal or come woe.

Up to this time the rural free-delivery service has been a political question. Many members of this House have for the first time tasted the sweets of public patronage. Many members of this House have built up around them a political wall which they think has aided them and will continue to aid them in future elections to this body.

It will aid you for a time, but the public official soon loses what gratitude he may have had at first, and becomes the poor, downtrodden, poorly paid Government official, under no obligation to any man under the sun. Do not let us lose sight of the fact that generally a public official, from the head of Cabinet down to the man who cleans the cuspidors, believes that he is not paid what his services are worth. Even some members of Congress believe that they are poorly paid. So that sentiment permeates the Government service from the head to the foot. Hence gratitude can have no lodgment in the heart of the Government official.

If the House will pardon me, I will briefly discuss the early history of this service. It has been before Congress in one way or another for many years. When I first came into these Halls we appropriated money for rural service, and it was experimented with in villages and in towns. That service was not a success, or at least it was discontinued.

We appropriated a small sum of money from year to year, but never until Mr. Wilson, then Postmaster-General, took up this subject was it ever given serious practical consideration. Mr. Wilson was well known during his lifetime to many members of this House; as honest, sincere, true, and faithful a man as ever served in the House of Representatives. Differing with me on many political questions, yet no man who has ever been here has been closer than he and I were upon questions outside of those regarded as political.

Some men besides Mr. Wilson have claimed that they were the fathers of the rural free-delivery service. I sometimes think that if Mr. Wilson's spirit hovers around this House, he must feel like offering up a prayer of thankfulness, when he sees the condition to which the rural free-delivery service has now come or contemplates the system as projected, that he is not here to conduct it and that it has passed from his hands forever. In the latter part of 1895 and through the winter of 1896 Postmaster-General Wilson was in consultation with all persons familiar or who should be familiar with a service of this character, endeavoring to gain information as to the practicability of inaugurating an experimental rural free-delivery service.

Many times I have spent hours in his room discussing the question, he gaining the information from the outside as to the probable cost on a basis of practicability, as at that time that was one of the principal questions of consideration. Mr. Wilson became satisfied, and so assured me, that this service could be inaugurated and continued, that carriers could be employed and glad to get the position at a salary of $300 a year. I combated that myself for a long time, not being in possession of information. Mr. Wilson said he had made research, satisfying him that, in view of the fact that the service covered the country where there were farmers with plenty of horses and plenty of boys, they would be glad, for $300 a year, to go out for four and not exceeding five hours in the middle of the day for this sum. As we all know, farmers' hours are sun to sun in the summer and in the winter from 5 a. m. until 6 or 7 at night, and for a boy, $300 earned by devoting a portion of a day to the work, not more than a third of it, would be such an income as they would be glad to secure.

The carrier service was instituted at $300 per annum. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has oftentimes warned this House regarding the probable future cost. He has been laughed at in the past; but now, using the vernacular of the street, "We are up against it." We paid $300 for some time. We never heard complaint. I don't think the Post-Office Department ever heard any complaint so long as $300 a year was paid as the salary. The Department came into the hands of the Republican party. A great organization was and is being built up in the Rural Free-Delivery Bureau.

This Bureau has grown up by your sanction to be the most extravagant Bureau, not only in this Government but any other government, that was ever organized; so that in a service so extended, and in which men were receiving $2,500 to $3,000 a year in comparatively small executive capacities, $300 for a carrier surely looked small. It was increased to $400, and in a short time, complaints coming in, it was increased to $500, and it is now increased to $600. The press, when a discussion was had on the urgent deficiency bill, sent out all over the country the information that "CANNON and LOUD opposed the increase of salary to the rural carrier."

A gentleman wrote me a letter the other day from a Western State, and took an occasion at the close to say—and, by the way, he was a rural carrier—the names of LOUD and CANNON will be remembered with hate, scorn, and derision so long as men continue to breathe in this free atmosphere.

[Laughter.]

Well, neither LOUD nor CANNON opposed the increased salary. But I took occasion to say then, as I say again, if you are to continue the service such as is outlined by this extravagant bureau, then you must pay from $850 to $1,000 a year in salaries, reckoning on the basis that it costs from $150 a year in some sections to possibly $250 in others for a horse, the wear and tear of the wagon, and the care of the animal.

The Post-Office Department informs us that there will be in five years 40,000—I say 50,000—carriers in the service. The prophecy was made only two years ago by the head of this service that it would not cost us more than $15,000,000 a year. Now, if there will be 40,000 carriers, and the salary is $850, it will cost us $42,000,000 a year, and if it be $1,000, it will cost us $50,000,000 a year, and that does not include the appropriations for the supervisory support and departmental support which are contained in the legislative appropriation bill, making the total $850,000, with what we are carrying in our bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Was the gentleman from California deceived when they estimated the expenditure at $15,000,000?

Mr. LOUD. Well, I want to say to the gentleman from New York that I had no more conception of what this service was to cost when we inaugurated these $300 salaries than I had of hereafter; not a bit. I have read the Bible and I have heard people preach, and the latter are very positive about the hereafter.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Does this proposed bill decrease any salaries excepting the carriers, and if so, which?

Mr. LOUD. When we get to the bill that will be a matter that will come up more properly under the five-minute rule. I will say that there are some salaries provided for here outside of the carriers. We do not decrease the salaries of the carriers. We do submit to you in every case lower salaries than are made in the estimate of the Post-Office Department, but for the carriers we do not.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman from California allow me a question?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. Would it be more unreasonable to take the rural free-delivery carriers, who have to go 25 miles or more in the mud and give them $1,000, than to pay the carriers in the city who have the pavements of the streets to walk upon? I mean in the line of what we may expect?

Mr. LOUD. That is a question that can not be answered properly offhand. There are conditions which I will reach a little later on, when I hope to discuss that question. The time consumed in the delivery is of course one of the considerations. It was assumed at first that these men might build up a profitable business, but the Post-Office Department have begun to prevent the carrier from doing anything else. They have absolutely prohibited him doing certain things, and there is no doubt in the world but that they propose to prohibit him from doing anything else but carry mail. If they do, if they prohibit a man doing anything else, and uniform him and discipline him, as they say, then you must pay him at least $1,000 a year, and I would advocate it myself, because I believe in paying a man a fair salary for a fair amount of work. Now, I hope to touch upon all these questions, if I have the time, before I get through.

The Post-Office Committee is charged with the responsibility of making recommendations to you regarding the Post-Office expenditures. They have no personal interest; it is a duty devolving upon them, and they must execute it. You all know how things are done on all committees. Subcommittees are appointed in our committee as well as in the Appropriation Committee. We began on the consideration of this question, as we regarded it as one of the most important questions that we should deal with, in the early part of December. Letters began to come in, petitions began to come in, asking for an increase of salary to $650, $700, $750, $800, and $850. At the very threshold we were confronted with these petitions.

Members of the House spoke to me, evidently had spoken to other members of the committee, giving us the benefit of their views as to what they thought these carriers should receive. Some members of the House thought it should be as low as $600. Most of them thought it should be $750, and others $800 and $850. The subcommittee endeavored to see if it was not possible to so fix the compensation of these rural-delivery carriers that it should not hereafter come home to trouble us.

Now, I am going to be perfectly frank with the House. I can give my own views and the views of my subcommittee and the whole committee, so far as I am able to understand them. Perhaps I am willing to be a little more frank than some other people are. The question of salaries is one of the most aggravating questions that confronts this body. There are no Government officials but who want an increase of salary. They have been here as long as I have been here, and they will probably be here as long as anyone remains here. They come to our homes; they go to our friends; they importune; they plead; they threaten. Yes; they threaten. Perhaps they do not threaten as much in my vicinity now as they did at one time. I mean that they do not threaten openly. But in 1896 they did threaten me openly.

While our Democratic friends on this side of the House did not have much respect for the Democratic Administration then, let me say that the Democratic Administration said to me, as they said to others: "Show us the man who threatens to defeat a Congressman because he has not advocated an increase of salary, and we will have his head before the rise of the sun." Do I believe an American citizen has the right to criticise a public official? Yes. I do not believe, however, that a Government employee has the right to threaten the legislative body when it fails to do his behest. I know most of you think that I am getting on dangerous ground. You would if you were there. But I will say this, that when I can not come to Congress and say and do what I want to, I can stay at home in peace and quiet, and I shall not want for my breakfast, either. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANDIS. Will the gentleman from California yield to me for a question?

Mr. LOUD. I will.

Mr. LANDIS. I would like to ask the gentleman if he heard any more of the threatenings after the Administration set its foot down?

Mr. LOUD. Well, that is a story that does not interest this House. Yes; and the carrier who delivered the mail at my office, who is friendly with me, importuned everybody in my district to vote against me. He had not wisdom enough to see that I had friends in the district; and they came to me by dozens and reported that this man was not even telling the truth, that he said I was trying to cut down their salaries, and had been since I had been here. Now, that is a position that these carriers will take. They will not take a fair position and say that you are opposed to an increase, but they will tell the people that you are trying to cut them down.

This young gentleman one morning was caught in a restaurant, with his feet on the table, reading a paper and charging the Government for his time. He was summoned to appear. I was the first man he came to. He said, "LOUD, I have a family of five children; won't you intercede for me?" I said, "You have been to every man in my district asking him to vote against me." "Yes," he said, "I have." That man is now a carrier. I asked the Department here at Washington to forgive him, and he is now in the service.

Those things are still going on and will continue. I have in my possession many letters, one of which I referred to here a short time ago.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman spoke of threats by Government employees. Does he know whether or not such threats were general, or were they confined to the gentleman's district?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, I do not know. I can not speak of matters outside my own district.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Exactly.

Mr. LOUD. I think, however, that human nature is a great deal the same, in Indiana as in California.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have never heard of any such threats in Indiana.

Mr. LOUD. Well, I do not know how the gentleman stands on these salary bills. I do not think Government employees threaten anybody that is for them. I am against these applications; if the gentleman is in favor of them there is no occasion for any threats in his case. But let me say, Californians are a great deal like Indianians. We have a great many people out there from Indiana, and, indeed, from all parts of the United States.

Now, then, I come back to the question I was discussing. The committee was striving to fix an adequate rate of salary. We found these conditions confronting us: Routes vary in length from 18 miles to 38 miles. Hardly any two routes are similar. Some routes are on level, macadamized roads, where one horse can haul a buggy very conveniently. Other routes—in the Western country, for instance—are over dirt roads, where it takes two horses to haul a buggy with a man in it.

We found that the routes are in some instances over a level country; in other instances over a mountainous country. We worked some time trying to regulate this matter upon the mileage basis; we almost arrived at a conclusion, and then we discovered that inequality would exist just as much on a mileage basis as upon a salary basis, because we found that upon one route there might be 400 people, while on another route of the same length there might be 1,500 or 1,800 people; so that, after all, mileage meant nothing.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman tell us how this inequality can be corrected under the contract system? If it can not be corrected by the committee or by this House, how can it be corrected by a contractor?

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman will possess his soul in patience for a moment——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will be patient.

Mr. LOUD. I want to say that nothing I may say can for a moment lead me to believe that the gentleman will ever follow what I advocate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I certainly will not.

Mr. LOUD. There is no doubt of that.

Now, there has been no secrecy about this matter. The committee, particularly myself, discussed this proposition with probably more members of the House than we have ever discussed any other proposition before. I discussed it with at least 100 members of the House. I did not discuss it with the gentleman from Georgia, because I knew it would be a waste of time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You were right; and I think you will find it a waste of time with others, too.

Mr. LOUD. I did discuss it with some gentlemen from whom I had some hopes of getting light; but that never entered my mind regarding the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Much obliged.

Mr. LOUD. I know, or think I know, something about the motives that influence these matters. I looked over some of the papers that we have in our committee room; and there are some others, permit me to say, outside of the gentleman from Georgia to whom my remarks would apply—gentlemen who, we thought, might have too much love for certain people to exercise that freedom of action which should be exercised by every member of this House.

After going over this ground, as I have suggested, we thought of the contract system—the system which we proposed in this bill. I can not tell how another man's mind revolves. Men who have been in this House with me know that it is as natural for me to oppose as it is to breathe. I never approach a question that every objection does not present itself to me first. And I approached this question from that standpoint. When the matter was first suggested I raised every objection that could possibly enter my mind. But those objections have been resolved one after another.

Now, members of this House are as apt to be misled regarding the merits of the question as are men outside. I saw a letter the other day from an ex-Postmaster-General agonizing—metaphorically speaking, shedding tears of blood—in anticipation of the day when the rural-delivery service shall be put under contract. That gentleman wrote to the Postmaster-General protesting against this system. "Why," said he, "we shall see again the Brady star-route contract frauds—corruption on every hand." I suppose the House knows something about the "Brady star-route contract frauds."

Under the system then prevailing a man could take 8,000, 10,000, or 15,000 contracts, and the Post-Office Department claimed that it had the power to increase the compensation after the contract was entered into. It was assumed that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Brady, "stood in" with the contractors, so that John Doe, who had bid for a certain route at, we will say, $5,000, could, after receiving the contract, be allowed extra compensation, increasing his pay to $10,000 or $15,000. Five thousand dollars or $10,000 or $15,000 might not have been much to a contractor for a single route, but if he had 10,000 or 15,000 routes the item was quite a respectable sum—at least enough to divide with somebody else.

Now, imagine this case: The ex-Postmaster-General anticipating this great fraud, where a man can take but one contract and must perform that service himself, corrupting the Post-Office Department or corrupting the head of that division and dividing this enormous sum of three or four or five hundred dollars a year that he may get for the use of a horse and for his own service with that Department. It almost makes you weep, does it not?—corruption all around you. The difficulty is that gentlemen outside of this House and some on the floor have not investigated this question. When the subcommittee finally took up the question of contracts, having substantially satisfied their minds that it was practical, that as good, if not a better, service could be performed under it, they then sought to place around it such safeguards as would amply protect it, so that we could have as good, if not a better, service under contract or under agreement than we have under a flat salary.

Mr. LANDIS. Will the gentleman from California read that part of the bill that provides that the bidder must do the service himself? I fail to find that in the bill.

Mr. GRIGGS. Why, it is there.

Mr. LOUD—

The service shall be awarded to the lowest bidder, who shall furnish evidence satisfactory to the Postmaster-General that such bidder is a legal and actual resident of the district or territory in which the proposed service is to be performed——

Mr. GILBERT. What does that mean—"district or territory?"

Mr. LANDIS. I do not see anything there that provides that the bidder must perform the service himself.

Mr. LOUD. One moment; wait till I get through—that he is a reliable and trusthworthy person, of good moral character, able to read and write, and having sufficient intelligence and ability to properly perform the service, and who shall tender sufficient guaranties that he will personally perform acceptable service.

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman please interpret what is meant by "district or territory?"

Mr. LOUD. One moment. I will give you all ample opportunity if I have time. I will repeat, "and having sufficient intelligence and ability to properly perform the service, and who shall tender sufficient guaranties that he will personally perform acceptable service."

Why, we have spent three months over this thing, almost day and night.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. WARNER. Can you tell us about how many rural free-delivery carriers there are now in the United States?

Mr. LOUD. About 7,000.

Mr. WARNER. About how many of those carriers have purchased wagons especially made for the service, and horses, at their own expense?

Mr. LOUD. That is something I do not know.

Mr. WARNER. You propose to throw those on their hands, after they have bought them on the promise of permanent employment.

Mr. LOUD. That is just where the gentleman shows that he has not even read the bill, Mr. Chairman, and I hope the House will at least do the Post-Office Committee the courtesy to read the bill, if they do not listen to the debate.

Mr. BOUTELL. Before they ask questions.

Mr. LOUD. Yes. The gentleman fails to read and still he criticises and assumes a condition to exist that does not exist. Now, I want to say in perfect candor that I believe that every man outside of those interested——

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question at this point?

Mr. LOUD. I shall endeavor to answer the questions put by the gentleman [Mr. GILBERT] a short time ago before I pass to what I was about to say. The gentleman asked me to define "district or territory." Well, the district in this case clearly applies to the rural-delivery district, because that is all that we are dealing with. I do not think any man could construe it to mean anything else than the district, and the word "territory" was added as an amendment.

Mr. GILBERT. I do not want to be captious, for I am rather in favor of the bill, and I think I will vote for it; but I would like to say that out of Shelbyville, Ky., there are five or six routes running. Now, supposing a man there puts in a bid, does he reside within the district?

Mr. LOUD. I should say that if he lives where the route started from that he lived on the route—in the territory.

Mr. GILBERT. Suppose he is out in the country, halfway between two routes?

Mr. LOUD. If he lives halfway between two routes, he lives in the territory where he receives his mail. That would be his territory—his district.

Mr. LATIMER. Then your interpretation would be that if there were four or five routes going out from a town one man would have a right to bid on all the routes, if he lived in that town?

Mr. LOUD. No, sir; because he could not take but one.

Mr. LATIMER. If he failed on one, would he still be permitted to bid on all of the routes?

Mr. LOUD. I do not think so.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion on the interpretation of "district or territory?" It seems to me that means the district or territory that is served by the carrier. In cities and towns, I understand, the rural carrier performs no service, so that a resident of a city or town, particularly if it already has free service, would not be eligible as a contractor if that interpretation is to be given it. I think probably that is the proper interpretation.

Mr. LOUD. I think that is a very small matter and one of the things we may more properly discuss when the bill is up under the five-minute rule. It is a very small matter, I will say, one way or the other.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. On this very point, raised by the gentleman from Illinois, who has not read the bill, I would like to say that I have read the bill and the report with care, but I am confused in doing so. The bill says, on lines 16, 17, and 18, referring to tenure of service, referring to carriers:

> Shall continue * * * until such time as the Postmaster-General shall advertise for proposals and make awards for the several routes on which such carriers are now employed.

That is in the bill. The report says, in the second paragraph:

> Under this measure all rural free-delivery carriers in the service on the 30th day of June, 1902, may be continued in the service at a salary not exceeding $900 per annum, but after that date such additional carriers as may be added to the service shall be designated pursuant to an advertisement inviting competitive bidding.

Now, to me there is a contradiction between the report of the committee and the letter of the law as framed in the bill.

Mr. LOUD. Now, let me ask the committee once more if they will not refrain from asking questions at this time about the technical meaning of a phrase in the bill, which properly comes up and will come up under the five-minute debate.

Lawyers differ about phraseology. Laymen seldom do. They look at the English language and soon discover what meaning the words were intended to convey.

I am perfectly willing to answer questions upon the general merits of the proposition; but until we get to the five-minute debate I prefer not to be interrupted by questions of this character.

Mr. GRAFF. May I ask the gentleman a question in connection with the general policy of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. GRAFF. There is nothing in the bill which places a limitation upon the maximum amount at which the bid may be let, is there?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, no.

Mr. GRAFF. If the bill provides no limitation of the maximum amount at which a route may be let at any particular locality, what answer has the chairman to the question as to what protection there is for the Government from collusion in the different localities where these bids are made, and where there is no considerable competition?

Mr. LOUD. Is that the gentleman's question?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes. I understand the bill is drawn with a view to a lower rate and to economy.

Mr. LOUD. Now, let me say to the gentleman that that is not the greatest motive that impelled the committee.

You can not fix a maximum rate under contract, because to-day some routes are worth $800 or $900 a year and some are not worth more than $300, owing to the varying conditions of the country.

Now, so far as collusion is concerned, I should assume that the gentleman thinks this the first time we had ever had a service of this kind in contemplation. We have had the contract system for many years.

Mr. GRAFF. But that contract system is simply for the carrying of the mail from the post-office to the depot, is it not?

Mr. LOUD. No; quite the contrary. I know that many gentlemen have said that. Even the late Postmaster-General, in a letter that I hope to refer to later—which, if anyone reads it I think he will see that the same mind produced it that has produced all that has been published over the country upon this subject—assumes to say that the star-route contractor carried only closed pouches; hence he should not necessarily be supposed to be competent to carry and deliver mail from house to house.

Let me say to this House that every star-route contract let a year ago, going into operation on the 1st of last July, in the first section, which embraced New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, West Virginia, and Virginia, every single star-route contract obligated the contractor to deliver and collect mail from every resident on his route, and he is doing it to-day.

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, but in those cases there was no limitation as to the number of contracts which any one person might obtain.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes, there was. The gentleman is mistaken again there. The Post-Office Department, under regulation, not under law, but assuming that they had the power, have compelled the contractor to live on the route.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is that in the free rural service?

Mr. LOUD. That is in the star-route service.

Now, I want the House to understand that the Post-Office Committee have given this matter a great deal of consideration, and I hope the House will give us the same consideration. This matter has been before the House for thirty or forty days, and yet gentlemen on the floor of the House are unfamiliar with the bill, or with the present law.

Mr. GRAFF. Does the gentleman mean to say that these recent contracts—and I want to say to the gentleman that I am somewhat familiar with them—contain a provision that the star-route carrier can deliver and collect mail?

Mr. LOUD. Not that he can, but that he must.

Mr. GRAFF. You say it is obligatory?

Mr. LOUD. That is his contract; yes.

Mr. BATES. Not to collect mail?

Mr. LOUD. To collect mail. I stand by what I said at first, to deliver and collect mail, and to do everything——

Mr. GRAFF rose.

Mr. LOUD. One moment, now. Let me finish this sentence. He contracts to do everything that the rural carrier does to-day, except register mail, which the rural carriers do not do to any extent, and to issue money orders, which they do not do but in a very small degree.

Mr. GRAFF. Now——

Mr. LOUD. Now, one moment. Let us keep cool about this.

Mr. GRAFF. I notice you have been very calm.

Mr. LOUD (continuing). It will be hot enough for you in three or four years from now. Let us all keep cool now. It will be hot enough for every one of you three or four years from now.

Mr. GRAFF. I want to ask the gentleman how many of these contracts exist. There are comparatively few of them?

Mr. LOUD. Some eight thousand in the first district, some eleven thousand, I think, in the fourth district.

Mr. GRAFF. In what States?

Mr. LOUD. The States included in the first district are New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and the two Virginias.

Mr. GRAFF. Where they are operating under these contracts?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. GRAFF. And collecting the mail?

Mr. LOUD. And collecting the mail.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Is it not a fact that as the Department construes the law the letter must be handed to the carrier and not collected from the box?

Mr. LOUD. That is true; but so far as the man is concerned, what is the difference as to his responsibility, whether the letter is handed to him or collected from a box. The letter carrier must take it from the box if it happens to be in the free rural delivery service, but if it is on a star route they do not have to take it out of the box. But they say the star-route man can not be trusted to carry the mail. He does carry it now. He has to be responsible for the carrying of the mail; but he is not a trustworthy man if he is to collect it from the hands of a man.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is in a mail pouch and locked, over the star routes?

Mr. LOUD. No, it is not. How can it be locked up when the man is to deliver it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. He had to deliver it at the post-office on the star routes in my part of the country until we put in the rural free-delivery system.

Mr. LOUD. I think the gentleman has evidently just come in.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No, I have not. I was here when you started, but I could not hear what you said, and I have come nearer so as to hear you.

Mr. LOUD. Then it is clearly useless for me to continue, because if I can not enlighten as bright a mind as the gentleman has I can not expect to make myself understood by anybody.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There were so many gentlemen talking here that I could not hear you.

Mr. LOUD. Now, let me finish a sentence I began ten minutes ago. I do not believe there is a man outside of those interested—I mean those in the Government service, the rural carriers and some postmaster that probably appointed them, and some special agents who think their responsibility would be less, and some other men who have some responsibility and apprehend that they can not get any more if this service is put under contract—that there is not a man in the country who will investigate this question as long and as carefully as the Post-Office Committee have but will come to the same conclusion that the Post-Office Committee come to.

The question has been fully discussed, and I do not think I am betraying any confidence of the Post-Office Committee when I say we went so far as to have a roll call in order to find out how every man stood. One member of that committee, when the measure was up for consideration, voted against it. Since that time one gentleman, who was busy over in a neighboring State at that time, has joined with the other gentleman. So that on the Post-Office Committee, with 17 Members and 1 Delegate, there are 15 members heartily for this and 2 gentlemen opposed to it.

Mr. GRAFF. How many members of your committee are outside of cities?

Mr. LOUD. Well, let us see. I think I have a list of the gentlemen. Mr. KETCHAM, the gentleman from New York, he is outside of a city—I will mention the names without referring to the States—well, I think nine-tenths of them.

Mr. GRAFF. Nine-tenths.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. SMITH of Illinois, Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey, my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM], Mr. SPERRY, Mr. BROMWELL, he is country and city; Mr. BINGHAM is from a city. Mr. CROMER, I do not know whether he is from a city or not; Mr. HEDGE, Mr. SIBLEY, Mr. BOUTELL.

Mr. COWHERD. I have two agricultural counties.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. BOUTELL is from a city; Mr. SWANSON, Mr. MOON, Mr. GRIGGS, Mr. LITTLE, Mr. COWHERD. I think the latter is from a city.

Mr. COWHERD. I have two agricultural counties as well, and rural free delivery all over one of them.

Mr. LOUD. I do not think there are but three city men.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question or two?

Mr. GRAFF. I would like to ask the gentleman how he expects to secure lower rates by reason of this competitive system of bidding than what now obtain?

Mr. LOUD. I have not stated that we would.

Mr. GRAFF. Then why are you advocating the measure?

Mr. LOUD. Because I think we will ultimately secure lower rates. I think if this service could be continued at $600 that there would not be much incentive to change it; but you can not do it. I do not know at what you will fix the salaries if you do not adopt this system. Under the salary system you will find one man covering 30 or 35 miles, delivering to 1,500 or 1,800 people, while another man will cover 18 or 20 miles and deliver to four or five hundred people, one man doing eight hours' work and another man four for the same salary.

Mr. SPERRY. Will the gentleman from California permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. SPERRY. I want to say to the gentleman from California that when this bill which is now under consideration was up in the Post-Office Committee I reserved the right to act as my own judgment might dictate when it came upon the floor of the House for consideration. That I believe the chairman of the committee will not object to.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Connecticut, like every other gentleman, has the right at all times to do what his conscience dictates or anything else dictates. I simply state that on the roll call every member present voted for it except the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and the gentleman from Connecticut was present.

Mr. SPERRY. Which bill does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. LOUD. I refer to the system now under consideration.

Mr. SPERRY. I distinctly stated that I reserved the right to act as I saw fit.

Mr. LOUD. Did the gentleman from Connecticut vote for this contract provision in the appropriation bill or not?

Mr. SPERRY. Very likely I might have.

Mr. LOUD. That is all I was talking about. I would not lay any stress on it except that——

Mr. SPERRY. I did not know what it was leading up to. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman from Connecticut voted for it after a full discussion, and his name is on record showing that fact.

Mr. GRAFF. He has changed his mind.

Mr. LOUD. No; he did not know. [Laughter.] He has reserved to himself the right to do as his conscience may ultimately dictate, and that is proper. He did not know when he voted for it what the bill was.

Mr. SPERRY. I knew, but I did not know what it was leading up to, and when I found out what it was leading to, I reserved the right to oppose the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. I do not know what the gentleman from Connecticut refers to when he says "what it was leading up to."

Mr. GRAFF. He is referring to the gentleman's speech; he has changed his mind. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPERRY. You can lead a horse to the trough, but you can not make him drink.

Mr. LOUD. Well, we led the gentleman from Connecticut up and made him drink once. [Laughter.] Now, if the committee will pardon me, I will take up the minority report of the committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Before the gentleman comes to that, I wish he would answer a question.

Mr. LOUD. Very well.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I wish the gentleman would explain how it is that the star-route service in some localities is now doing what the rural free-delivery service is doing, delivering mail near the highways and at the front gates of the citizens of the country? How is it that the star-route service operating today is doing that service? The star-route service in my country is a stage service, and they no not go off the pike; they do not go off the highway.

Mr. LOUD. Neither does the rural free-delivery carrier.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why, yes he does.

Mr. LOUD. Then he disobeys his instructions. The instructions are absolute that each person receiving the mail must erect a box on the road so that the carrier shall not be compelled to dismount either to put mail into the box or to take it out.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But he delivers letters near the highways and byways that heretofore no mail was ever delivered in.

Mr. LOUD. But he only goes along the route, along the highway.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Of course; but he delivers mail along by the front gate and he takes letters out of the boxes. The star-route service does not do that, or didn't do it before we had the rural free-delivery service. If the star-route service can do that, and does it effectively, I would like to hear the gentleman state the facts about it.

Mr. LOUD. If it is a fact that they do it, then it is a fact, and it does not need any further statement or explanation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean to say that it will be practicable for the stage to go a quarter or half a mile off from the route to deliver the mail?

Mr. LOUD. No; neither can the rural free-delivery carrier.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; because there is a box in front of every man's house that obtains the route, but before that service we had no such attention as that. I do not know which way I am going to vote on this proposition. I want to get all the light I can.

Mr. LOUD. Now I will take up the minority report, which I suppose presents the argument of the two gentlemen who have signed it—a report written I do not know by whom—whether the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] or the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROMER]. It bears the mark of a newspaper man. I might think perhaps the gentleman from Indiana drew it; but as it begins "Mr. SWANSON, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads," I must assume that the gentleman from Virginia wrote it. At least he indorses the report. On the first page of the report I read:

> It should be noted that if the present status of the service is continued the Department will not be barred from offering the routes to those who will bid the lowest. We are satisfied that the Department will be willing to make experiments in different sections of the country—

I suppose the gentleman speaks on behalf of the Department. This service was organized in 1896, and yet up to 1902 they have never tried the contract service. I suppose the gentleman speaks by the card and for the Department when he says:

> We are satisfied that the Department will be willing to make experiments in different sections of the country to ascertain whether this contract system has in it the merits claimed for it by its advocates.

I should like to ask why, in God's name, they have not experimented a little during the last six years?

Mr. SWANSON. The gentleman has rural delivery in his district. Has he ever asked that the contract system be tried there?

Mr. LOUD. I have not.

Mr. SWANSON. We say that before the system is applied generally, some experiments should be made in different sections of the country to see whether it is a success or not.

Mr. LOUD. You are evidently speaking for the Department in the report, because you speak with such confidence. You say, "We are satisfied."

Mr. SWANSON. We thought the Department would be willing to experiment before putting the system in operation throughout the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BOUTELL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has control of the time and can proceed as long as he wishes.

Mr. LOUD. I might assume—I do not think it is a great stretch of the imagination—that this report emanates from the greatest literary bureau under the pay of the United States Government that ever saw the light of day—a bureau which has at its head a literary man with a salary of $3,000 a year. When I asked his chief what the forte of this gentleman was, he said, "His forte is in drawing reports not executive." Yet he is an assistant superintendent who is supposed to have executive ability, which his chief says he has not, but that he is a great writer. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. Who is the man?

Mr. GRAFF. Will not the gentleman from California give us some reasons why he thinks this system would be a success? He has not done so yet.

Mr. LOUD. I will try to do so; I thought I had already done so partially. At any rate, I have approached the question.

Mr. GRAFF. You have started to do so several times.

Mr. LOUD. I have started, yes; but the gentleman probably knows how hard it is to make a connected argument when interrupted every minute.

Mr. GRAFF. Yes; I have had that experience with the gentleman from California himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. Then you know what it is.

The minority report continues:

Under the present system a carrier is practically a traveling postmaster.

I want you to listen to this.

He collects mail, he distributes mail, he registers letters.

He does not register letters. He gives a receipt for a letter, which he takes to the post-office and the postmaster registers.

He sells stamps; he accepts money for the purchase of money orders.

Now, that is true. He gives receipts for letters or packages to be registered; he gives receipts for money to buy money orders; and when he receives the registers or obtains the money order he takes back the receipt for the registered letter or he takes back the money order.

During the last year there were 51,428 letters and packages registered in this service, and there were 4,301 rural delivery carriers. On that basis these carriers registered 12 letters or packages, or 1 apiece in each month. Probably there were not 4,301 carriers for the whole year. But let us double that number, and let us assume that last year the rural carrier registered 2 letters a month. He must be, of course, a man of great qualifications and sterling ability to give 2 receipts a month for registered letters. Could a star-route contractor be a man of sufficient honesty and integrity to perform that work?

The policy the Government has always pursued in the selection of employees requiring special personal fitness is to fix a specific salary and then try to get the best person for that salary. We can see no reason why there should be a departure in this respect in the selection of rural carriers. We do not see why rural carriers should be discriminated against—why a different ruling should be applied to them from that applied to all other employees in other branches of the postal service.

This brings me to the question which a gentleman here has asked. And the same question has been asked in the public press: Why not put the city carrier under contract? Well, that question does not confront us, even if it were worthy of discussion.

But the question is raised here in this report, "Why not apply the contract system to other employees?" Now, I will tell you. There is not an employee in the postal service, outside of the contractor, who does not perform a stipulated number of hours of service each day. He does not perform a stipulated amount of work, but he works a stipulated number of hours. He works by the hour. The rural carrier covers a given number of miles. It may be 14; it may be 40; it may be over a level road, as I have said before; it may be over a hilly or a mountainous road; he may deliver to three or four hundred people, or he may deliver to 2,000 people.

Mr. GRAFF. What is the average?

Mr. LOUD. The average is much less than I thought it was. I think it is less than 22 miles, taking the whole number. Now, then, for that reason, in view of the varying conditions, a salary is not equitable. In view of the varying conditions, a contract, and a contract alone, can meet the conditions, because then we assume we shall pay for each and every route what it is worth. A gentleman some time ago made a suggestion about collusion. We have now 37,000 contract routes, in round numbers, some eight or nine thousand of them mail-messenger service, the contract for which, I think, would fit this service more properly than the contracts that surround the star-route service.

There an agreement is entered into. It is a contract, yes. An agreement is entered into with John Doe to perform a certain service, and he makes his proposition, reserving the right to throw up his contract or agreement upon thirty days' notice, the Government reserving the right to cancel it on their part upon thirty days' notice. Argument has been made and will be made that when the winter time came, under that provision, the contractor would throw up his route. Well, now, this provision we have here does not limit it to that character of contract.

The Department, under this provision, could contract for a year, or a less term, if it saw fit, and we must assume that men who will bid for this work are men of ordinary common sense, and they will bid a sum for which they think they can profitably perform the work. That is, a man looks the situation over and says to himself, "For a year I can make four or five or six or seven or eight hundred dollars out of this work." Now, when the winter time comes he is not going to throw up that job because there happens to be two or three, or possibly four, weeks of bad weather. Of course, if he has taken the contract for less than he can perform it for, he need not wait until winter, but the Department there, as they have now, would have ample and absolute control over the system. Now, then, we provide that a man must be able to read and write, as we now provide for a mail messenger, because he has to fill out his agreement himself and sign it.

As to this rural delivery carrier, now under the classified service as he is by the order of the President, what is he? Incidentally he is an employee of the Government. Incidentally, I say, and put great emphasis upon it; incidentally an employee of the Government, and the Department is seeking to make him a permanent employee; and if you make him that, as I said before, you have got to pay him what a permanent employee of the service is worth. I say that the rural carrier, up to this moment, has been encouraged to deliver, at the same time he delivers a letter, a package, a yard of calico, a dozen eggs, or a sack of potatoes for the merchants in the town who have sent these things out to their customers.

The idea that a man who works for the Government only incidentally shall be a civil-service regular Government employee is ridiculous. We have encouraged them to do this thing. Why not let them do it in the future and take into consideration how much they can make outside so long as they perform their contract to deliver letters, to give receipts for registered letters, to give receipts for money, and to collect the mail just the same as has been done since the inauguration of the star-route service by the contractors for the individual and charging him for it. I do not know how many of you are familiar with riding on stage coaches. I have ridden a great deal in my time throughout the West, and it has been the universal custom, not for the star-route contractor himself, but for the man whom he hires to drive the horses and deliver the mail, and who probably is not of as high a grade as the contractor himself, to deliver mail and collect it for at least the last thirty or forty years, to my own personal knowledge.

Mr. SIMS. I should like to make a statement about the star-route service in our own country. This thing has occurred often: Men would bid for a route, not with reference to what it was worth for carrying the mail, but with the idea that they could make so much by carrying packages and passengers. They received the contracts and gave bond for four years. The package and passenger service did not pay what they thought it would, and they would throw up the contract, and the bondsmen would have to suffer. That has often occurred, within my knowledge, in my State. This is not antagonizing this idea at all, but it is something to be considered.

Mr. LOUD. All the antagonism, I think, that has ever been raised against the star-route service has come from the objection against the man who sublets the contract. There were four or five men in the country, under that system, who bid in all of the star routes.

Mr. SIMS. These were all subcontractors who got into this trouble.

Mr. LOUD. On some of the contracts they would make money and on some of them they would lose money, but they had their agents go over the country making representations to certain people, endeavoring to persuade them to take subcontracts. I believe they have made representations in some cases that have induced some men to take these contracts for less than they could be performed in a proper manner; but nothing of that kind can possibly attach to this, because we deal directly with the man himself, and before he can be awarded the contract he must be a man fitted to perform the work.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] in his minority report says:

We insist that it is perfectly practicable to establish routes requiring about eight hours' service of the rural carrier and that his compensation can be fixed on short routes in proportion to the time it takes him to complete his work.

Now the gentleman tells us what we can do. It never has been done. If Congress fixes the salary of rural carriers at $1,000 a year, not alone the man who has a 38-mile route will get the thousand dollars, but the man who has a 12-mile route will get it. It is the tendency of the times, and if the gentleman himself were in executive command he could not prevent it. The tendency is to compare the lowest with the highest. The tendency is to break down rather than to elevate.

Mr. GRAFF. Would it not be better to fix the compensation according to the time occupied, or which ought to be occupied, in the performance of the work?

Mr. LOUD. Well, if you fix the time——

Mr. GRAFF. And to make the compensation so much per hour.

Mr. LOUD. If you make the compensation so much per hour, you encourage your man to put in his whole day. The rural carrier is a good deal the same as you or myself. If we received so much an hour here for our work we would put in a full day, would we not?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes; but could not the Government make an examination into the different routes and determine on the time necessary to perform the work on that particular route?

Mr. LOUD. It would simply be the judgment of one man against that of another. It is impossible.

Mr. GRAFF. There must be some judgment exercised somewhere.

Mr. LOUD. It is impossible to fix that accurately.

Mr. GRAFF. It does not seem to me this House is very competent to exercise the judgment. That is the difficulty in the matter.

Mr. LOUD. Under this system we would not exercise any judgment. Each man would exercise his own judgment, and he is the proper man to exercise it. A man born and brought up in a country knows what it is worth to carry the mail there. I say, without fear of successful contradiction, that under the contract system you will pay every man what the service is worth, and you will have as good if not a better service than you have to-day.

Mr. PEARRE. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. PEARRE. Does every carrier in the rural service now get $500 a year?

Mr. LOUD. I am not saying that they do.

Mr. PEARRE. Does not the gentleman know that they do not?

Mr. LOUD. If you will allow me to answer the question in my own way, I will do so. If I can not, I will not answer it at all. I know that there are a number of star-route contractors, men who have contracts for carrying the mail under the star-route system, who are rural-delivery carriers.

Strange as that may appear, it is a fact. I have one in my district, a man who is a star-route contractor and rural-delivery carrier. When the Government paid the carriers $300 a year they paid these men $200 a year, and when they increased the salaries they increased the star-route men on a percentage, not up to $400, but up to $300, or in a percentage ratio. I know there are several of these cases throughout the country.

Mr. PEARRE. Those are not the men to whom I am referring. The men to whom I refer are not star-route men at all. They are simply rural-delivery carriers, and one of those of whom I speak is paid $400 and another $500, and I know others are paid $350.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. HILL. In my district we have half routes, with the carrier getting half pay.

Mr. LOUD. I do not know but what that exists. I hope it does. I hope they are not paying men for 8 miles as much as they are paying for 40 miles.

Mr. PEARRE. And yet the gentleman says that the Department does not discriminate.

Mr. LOUD. But I do say, gentlemen, that at least 97½ per cent of the carriers are paid exactly the same, regardless of the amount of work they do.

Now, our friends enter their objections in the minority report, and they are serious:

Again, under the contract system it would be difficult to get changes in established routes.

Why, what would we have under the present system? We have a contract, the terms of which are constantly flexible. That is, where a man undertakes a contract of 30 miles in length, to deliver to so many post-offices, if they shall add a post-office to it, or add an additional mile, they make a proposition to him—and he is not bound by it—to pay him a proportionate increase, or if they take off, to pay him a proportionate decrease; and he has the option to throw up his contract—the Government giving thirty days' notice—or take the price that is made. So there is no difficulty about that. It would be more flexible than the system you have now, because you can not change the latter after you have once established a route until you have sent an agent there to examine and to consult the wishes and desires of a great many people.

Every time a route was changed, increased, or curtailed for the accommodation of the patrons or in the interest of good service it would be necessary, under this bill, to relet the contract.

I say, no; absolutely no. The gentleman who wrote this report here, I think, did not know any more about the contract service, which has been in existence for years, than he does know of "hereafter," and I do not refer to the gentleman from Virginia. [Laughter.]

The friends of the contractor—

Now, here we are—

The friends of the contractor, fearing that he would not be the lowest bidder under the reletting, would antagonize any change in the route for the accommodation of the people or in the adjustment of established routes when new service would be added.

Well, now, the contractors—and there are 37,000 of them in this country—never bother me. If their routes have been curtailed or expanded, as they have and as they are being every day, they never have bothered me. The man who, on his own responsibility, having the intelligence of the average citizen, enters into an agreement to do a certain thing does not need the sympathy of anybody else, and if perchance he asks for it he does not get it.

The bill also leaves to the discretion of the Department the determining of the trustworthiness and character of the bidders.

Well, I would like to know to whom the trustworthiness and the character of the carriers is left now, if it is not to the Post-Office Department.

Whenever an unacceptable carrier would be the lowest bidder, complaint would be lodged with the Department, and interminable conflicts and scandals ensue. Every community would have dissensions over the worthiness or unworthiness of the various bidders, which they would seek to ventilate before the Department, and insist upon the Department passing upon them.

You would not have anything of that kind with the men who want to be carriers, and to be included in the Government employ regularly, but if it is a contractor we would have great sympathy for him at once.

Which they would seek to ventilate before the Department and insist upon the Department passing upon them. Every Representative—

Now he gets sympathetic for us; he is so much interested in us—

Every Representative in Congress would be besieged to take a hand one way or the other in these conflicts.

I would like to know where there is a member of Congress today who is going to vote against this proposition that is not most earnest and willing to take a hand in the distribution of the present plunder, so called. It would not be a hand, my friend; it would be both arms up to the shoulders. [Laughter.]

Every Representative in Congress would be besieged to take a hand one way or the other in these conflicts. The only escape the Department would have from such a deplorable system would be to strictly adhere to awarding a contract to the lowest bidder. It is easily seen that if this course should be pursued, a very unacceptable and inefficient class of employees would be secured.

Oh, I congratulate my friends who are getting old. You will not have to bother with this.

Mr. GROW. I am not getting old.

Mr. LOUD. I did not refer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GROW. All right.

Mr. LOUD (reading)—

The bill also gives the Postmaster-General the power to reject any or all bids.

Well, he has that power now—the power that he has over these 37,000 contracts, and a power that he must have in order to break up the very collusion that my friend from Illinois suggests. Why, when the Post-Office Department adopted this new system of requiring the star-route contractor to live on the routes, when they called for bids on the first section, they sent out their entire inspection force, 21 of them, to examine and determine whether the conditions had been complied with, as they always do. If there is any collusion, they easily discover it, and the Postmaster-General has power to reject any and all bids.

This provision would be a standing inducement to political partisans in all sections of the country to bring all the pressure possible to bear on their Representatives in Congress.

Think of it. This power to reject any and all bids which they have had for years, they say, will be a standing inducement to political partisans in all sections of the country to bring all the pressure possible to bear on their Representatives in Congress to have the Department reject bids where their political friends had been unsuccessful.

The author of this knows something about the contention for place. He knows the contention that has gone on for places as rural free-delivery carriers, and he can not see but that it must be necessarily carried into the contract system; but no, it tends to purify. It would relieve the Congressman from pressure and put this business upon a business basis where the individual stands upon his own responsibility and could not and would not come to you or me to seek to help him, because he stands in the sunlight as a noble creation depending upon himself and his own exertions and not lying down upon the member of Congress to take care of him in the future.

Then the report goes on to discuss the question, which I have spoken of before, of their pay under the contract. The report reads:

> In the winter months, during inclement weather, when the roads are bad and the work of delivering the mail is very disagreeable, there would be many abandonments of contract and new contractors could not be secured except at exorbitant prices.

That is to say, if they had a good job for ten or twelve months under their contract, and there came a week or two of bad weather, they would throw up the job. Why, during this winter there has been as much as a week during which the rural free-delivery carrier did not deliver a mail in some sections.

The report goes on to say:

> Again, we are not satisfied that this would result in any saving of money to the Government. The star-route service, let under the new rules requiring the contractor to live along the line of his route, has resulted in a large increase of expense, many of the new routes costing the Government more than the carriers under the present rural free-delivery service.

That is a question I do not care to discuss. I have my opinion that we will get it for one-half. We will get it throughout the country for less than $600 a route. In some sections of the country it will be more and some sections less. There are many parts of this country where $600 for a horse and cart is a great deal of money, and there are some parts of the country where it is not.

Take it in New England and through the northern tier of States, Illinois, Indiana, etc., where horse hire is high and wages are high, $600 to do the work would not be ample. But you take it south of what we used to term "Mason and Dixon's line," and $600 is good compensation for this work. I do not care to discuss what it will cost. I believe it will cost less per route than it costs under $600 per route to-day. But you can not keep this at $600 if you fix it, you can not keep it at $700, and you can not keep it at $800, you can not keep it at $900; you may keep it at $1,000.

Mr. WATSON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Suppose this question of salary were not assumed by Congress at all; that is, Congress should not assume jurisdiction of the salary, but permit it to remain discretionary with the Post-Office Department, and let that Department wrestle with it; could not they deal with it without being subject to the political influence of the country, notwithstanding the great number of rural free-delivery carriers?

Mr. LOUD. We have had an illustration of that right here this winter. This is an experimental service. There is no salary fixed, but we appropriate a sum of money. It was known in a general way that they were receiving $500 a year. My friend the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] got up on the floor and offered an amendment increasing the amount of a deficiency appropriation, and that is all he did. The Department asked for a deficiency of $225,000, and through the efforts of my friend from Connecticut that was increased to about $500,000. He took occasion to suggest that the rules of the House prohibited us from fixing the salary, but he hoped that the more generous body at the north end of the Capitol, not always controlled by its rules, would see the wisdom of fixing the salary.

Now, the body at the other end of the Capitol struck the appropriation out, but in conference it went back in. No salary is fixed, but the Department increased it $100 just the same. No; you can not stem it; you can not silence the demand. I do not think I am going too far when I say that in the rural districts, in three years from now, there will not be a man who can be elected to Congress, or even to the United States Senate, unless he shall accede to the demands that these people make.

They are already organizing a national association; they have not held the national meeting yet, but they have the State organizations. The carriers of the State of Illinois ask for $850. I do not know what is asked for in the State of Indiana. I think I know something about the views of the average legislator. I think that there has not been a day for four years, or for ten years, but that if this body were confronted with various bills here for the increase of salaries of postal employees they would not have voted for them by quite a large majority; and yet many of them, permit me to say, in their consciences believe that some of them are getting all the salary they ought to get.

I say they wield a power in the great cities of the country to-day nearly sufficient to defeat any man for Congress who does not advocate their measures. And they are human, just the same as you or I. If Congress should increase our salaries to $10,000 a year, we would take the money; and most of us, if we had the courage, would vote for the increase. I say it is nothing but cowardice which prevents us from so voting. You may sit and talk with the average member—and that means the majority of the House of Representatives and the Senate—and he will, with great earnestness, tell you that $5,000 a year is not an adequate salary for a member of the House or the Senate.

Now, why do we not increase the salary? Because we are afraid. That is all—we are afraid. We might just as well acknowledge the fact as try to hide behind any pretense to the contrary. I think I am not affected that way. This is one of the best jobs I ever had in my life. I can live on $5,000 a year, and live well. I believe that my constituents could get many men better than I am for the same amount of money. I know that there are men in both Houses of Congress who have had large law practice or have had great business interests. There are men at the other end of the Capitol who can make a million dollars a year; and I have no doubt they are worth a million dollars a year as business men. But as legislators, no.

Now, we might as well look this question right in the face. The rural carrier politically will have the influence of at least 20 city carriers. Why? Because he has a small territory. He does not deliver mail on the average to more than 100 families. If he is married, as he will be some time, he is related by ties of blood to 20 or 25 per cent of the people there. The people on that route have known him as a boy and as a young man.

They have known him as a good young man, and he has a nice family growing up around him. They sympathize with him, and when it comes to a question of the salary to be fixed for rural carriers, each community, so far as that question is concerned, knows only its own carrier. They sympathize with him; they would like to see him get a large salary, and they will urge you and urge me to vote such a salary, and human as they are they will demand it. And while you are down here attending to your Congressional duties, as I hope you always do during the preliminary contests, some other who can promise more than you can will undermine you.

These are facts. There is no one here who can deny them. I know that many men here will argue that we are great and strong and are never controlled by local considerations; that we at all times vote for what is best, not for ourselves and our districts, but for the whole country—laying great stress upon "the whole."

A gentleman was asked in a legislative body when a bill was up the other day whether he thought it was constitutional, and he declined to answer. Evidently he had argued that this legislation was unconstitutional; but when it was for his district, constitutional or not, it must go. Yet evidently the same man, put upon his honor on a question of this kind, would say, "I always vote for the good of the whole country, and never consider my own locality."

Mr. WATSON. May I ask the gentleman a question for information?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. Is the salary of the railway mail clerks at present discretionary with the Department, or is it fixed by statute?

Mr. LOUD. The maximum is fixed.

Mr. WATSON. By statute?

Mr. LOUD. We fix the maximum of the different classes—class 5, $1,400; class 4, $1,200; class 3, $1,000.

Mr. WATSON. The amount of salary actually paid is discretionary with the Department?

Mr. LOUD. The minimum salary is discretionary; yet the Department always pays the maximum, provided the necessary amount of money is appropriated.

Mr. WATSON. Does the same rule apply to the city carriers?

Mr. LOUD. The salary of the city carriers is fixed by law—$600 the first year in cities of more than 75,000 population, $800 the second year, and $1,000 the third year. There is no discretion in the Department on that question.

Whether the Department would use the amount appropriated for a given service or not is well illustrated in the case of the Southern mail subsidy. The gentleman is no doubt familiar with that. We have for a number of years appropriated $196,000 as a subsidy for the transportation of the mails from New York to New Orleans. We have in connection with that appropriation put on a provision which we thought would control any man's conscience—that this money can not be used unless it appears to the Postmaster-General that such expenditure is for the benefit of the service.

What do the Department officials say? They say they have protested against this appropriation; they have refrained from asking it, but that as Congress under these circumstances has continued to appropriate the money, specifying where it could be used, they have no discretion, and they use it—as the Department always will use all the money it gets. There is no doubt about that. The more money a department uses the greater it becomes. And that is the trouble with this rural delivery division, to which I want to call the attention of the House again.

This rural-delivery service has grown up within two or three years. We have appropriated $275,000 for it in the legislative bill. That does not include even the salary of the chief. It does include that of the subchief, to whom I have referred—the chief of the literary bureau—but not the real chief, the "big Injun."

The division of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, a branch of the Government organized for years, having 37,000 contracts to let or supervise, 11,000 railway mail clerks, all of the mail-messenger service, the ocean steamship service, the coast steamboat service; a branch of the Government distributing about $60,000,000 a year, or about one-half of the expenditures of the Post-Office Department, is managed by the expenditure of $185,000 a year, including the salary of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Perhaps you grasp the magnitude of this great bureau that has been built up under your nose here without legislation. The chief clerk of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General—I think one of the most able men in that Department—receives $2,100 a year, and the committee refused to increase that amount. Yet some assistant superintendent here—I understand it was one H. Conquest Clark, who is a great writer—gets $3,000 a year; Mr. Somebody Else, $2,750 a year; Mr. Somebody Else, who supervises the civil-service end bureau in there—they have got a little civil-service bureau there—$2,500 a year, and big salaries all the way down the line.

Now, when I first brought this subject of contract up, I naturally went to the man at the head of the division, Mr. Machen, to discuss this question with him. I spent an evening with him. He raised no objections to it. I will not say that he advocated it; he seemed to advocate it. Oftentimes we have been in positions where someone seemed to consent, yet did not consent. I have an idea that, when that gentleman went to his home and reflected, he said to himself, "contracts, contracts, contracts—second assistant's department, second assistant's department, second assistant's department—no, no; it would take away from MY bureau, detract from it, while we are building up the greatest thing in the universe." And he is but human.

With the first assistant I did the same. I spent a whole Sunday with him at his invitation, and went over this question from start to finish. He raised every objection that appeared to his mind, which I met. When we separated he said, "This seems to be the solution of this question; I will think it over further." Yet within forty-eight hours he came before our committee—and his testimony is published—and said that he did not think that they could have as good discipline, and that is all. He did not know anything about contract service. Mr. Machen knows nothing about contract service.

The practicability of it could only be determined by men who were familiar with it, but after forty-eight hours' consultation with the agents which the First Assistant told me he had had the thought perhaps entered his mind that the First Assistant's Department might not be so great a Bureau; perhaps the Second Assistant may get it. Then he opposed it. And he is but human. Every man at the head of a department wants to make that division as great as he can.

Mr. GRAFF. Does not the gentleman from California think it is very unfair to attribute to all of these employees of the Post-Office Department motives of that sort? Is it not a good deal more reasonable to suppose that they were actuated by what they believed to be the best interests of the service and of the country, than to take the position that they opposed a policy of this sort because they thought it might result in the shrinking of their importance?

Mr. LOUD. Why, yes, yes, yes, with the average man; with the Government official, no; with some Government officials, three times no. I am willing to give every man the benefit of honest motives and conviction, but after I shall, at your invitation, have spent a whole day with you over a question which is either right or wrong in the abstract, leaving out details, and I shall tell you before I leave you that every obstacle is removed, that I am for it, you can bet your life, Brother GRAFF, I will be for it until Gabriel blows his horn. [Applause and laughter.] I never make up my mind——

Mr. GRAFF. I believe you would, if you changed your mind.

Mr. LOUD. I will never make up my mind until I have investigated every objection to it, and when once made up I shall stand by it. No man is fit to be at the head of any great division that makes up his mind before he has investigated, or having investigated and made up his mind, does not stand there.

Mr. GRAFF. What does the Department advocate in place of this?

Mr. LOUD. The First Assistant's department—well, I will not say the First Assistant's department, for the First Assistant Postmaster-General has tendered his resignation. I hope this service has not been the cause of it. I sometimes fear it, but I hope not. He has tendered his resignation. The head of this bureau wants to continue the service as now in operation.

He said he could hold them at $600 if he had the power, yet he told me within thirty days that whatever action Congress might take the Post-Office Department would not increase the salaries above $500; that if Congress appropriated an additional amount in the deficiency bill—and I will stand by my words—that they would simply use it for the extension of the service and leave Congress to deal with this question.

Mr. WATSON. You mean, now, that Mr. Machen said that to you?

Mr. LOUD. Yes; Mr. Machen.

Mr. WATSON. Is it a fact that Mr. Machen himself afterwards regulated this salary and increased it to $600?

Mr. LOUD. I do not know. He spoke for the Department. Presumably he regulated it. I do not know.

Mr. WATSON. Is it not a fact that he increased the salary?

Mr. LOUD. I do not know. He seemed to speak for the Department. Up to the incoming of the present Postmaster-General he has been the Bureau absolutely, and has had introduced a bill to make him the fifth assistant postmaster-general—not to make him that, but to create the office—with greater power than was ever vested in any assistant in any department in our Government, giving the holder of the office absolute power, above the Postmaster-General, to perform acts himself.

The bill did not name Mr. Machen, but it was his hope—as he expressed it to you and to me, and to many others—to build up a great division, a rural-delivery division with the city-delivery division; and under the law they shall have the absolute power now, if this bill shall pass, to extend the delivery to the towns. There is not a lawyer in the world who can controvert it.

The law to-day prohibits the delivery of mail outside a town of 10,000 population or $10,000 receipts, and I assume that at any time, if the point of order was raised against the rural free-delivery service, any man occupying that chair, having due regard for the law—because there is an absolute prohibition—must hold that in view of the law prohibiting delivery of mail outside of cities of that size it could not, without legislation, be delivered outside of those limits.

Now, if you provide for rural legislation you provide for delivery not only in the country but in every town, village, and hamlet and every foot of territory in the United States. You did not think that. You opposed some proposition last year put upon the appropriation bill looking toward village delivery. When you get rural delivery established by law you have got village delivery.

Mr. GRAFF. Is it not true that the gentleman from California is opposed to the rural-delivery system, anyhow?

Mr. LOUD. Emphatically I am not. I am not vain, but I assume that rural delivery would not have been started under Mr. Wilson's administration if I had not advocated it. I do not claim much for myself. I loved Mr. Wilson and he loved me. I honored him and he honored me. I trusted him and he trusted me.

I advised him, and if he were alive to-day he would tell you so. He went all over the field, considered it practically, and decided that at a salary of $300 a year, which he believed was enough, it could be done within a reasonable figure, and on my recommendation it was established. I do not want any credit for it. The last Postmaster-General seemed willing to accept the credit of being the father of it, and I am perfectly willing it should rest there.

I have advocated rural delivery from the start, worked for it, planned for it, and used my influence and best endeavors toward its establishment. And to-day I am struggling for the continuation of the system upon lines which I believe to be right and which I feel ultimately must be adopted.

Mr. LATIMER. Will the gentleman allow a question just there?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. LATIMER. I want to ask if you are opposed to free delivery in cities and towns of less than 10,000—in other words, between the cities and the country?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, no.

Mr. LATIMER. Then this bill, as I understand it, will permit free delivery in cities and towns of less than 10,000?

Mr. LOUD. There is no doubt about it. The present law prohibits that beyond certain limitations. This provides for delivery in rural districts, provides for rural delivery.

Mr. LATIMER. I want delivery in the small towns.

Mr. LOUD. Surely a town of three or four thousand is a rural town.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman contends that the language "in rural districts" would include towns under 10,000.

Mr. LOUD. Yes; because you repeal, at least by implication, the prohibition which at present exists.

Mr. SWANSON. That was repealed when rural delivery was first commenced.

Mr. LOUD. Rural delivery has heretofore been simply experimental, running from year to year. This year we are confronted with the proposition that we must legislate or else appropriate by law some $8,000,000 to be expended in the Post-Office Department as they see fit, and I think they have expended it a little too extravagantly in the days gone by.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Has not this appropriation been protected from the point of order by the fact that it was experimental?

Mr. LOUD. I do not think so. I do not believe you have a right even to experiment upon an appropriation bill with what is prohibited by statute. Of course I have, perhaps, pretty strong views upon this. I may not be in accord with other men in the House, but I do not believe that on an appropriation bill you have a right to do, even for one day, a thing that it is prohibited by law.

Mr. SWANSON. Has it not been held that after you make an appropriation in one appropriation bill, which runs for one year, being for something in existence, then it is in order?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes; for "a public work already in progress." That ruling was first made to cover either river and harbor work or a public building; but it has been extended and carried to this subsidy going south, which has been considered "a public work already in progress;" but a public work already in progress is not specifically prohibited by law as village delivery is. But let me say, so far as my view goes, that subsidy to the South is absolutely prohibited by law, because the law fixes the maximum rate that may be paid, and Congress can not change that maximum even for an hour without changing existing law.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I wish the gentleman would change the words "subsidy to the South." I think the most of it goes to the Pennsylvania Railroad.

Mr. LOUD. No. The Pennsylvania Railroad only gets about $28,000.

Mr. LATIMER. I should like to ask the gentleman one further question in regard to free delivery in towns; if, in your judgment, the delivery in the small towns that have not free delivery now will be under the contract system?

Mr. LOUD. Will be?

Mr. LATIMER. Yes.

Mr. LOUD. Why, yes.

Mr. LATIMER. If this bill passes?

Mr. LOUD. Why, yes.

Mr. LATIMER. Then why discriminate between the larger towns and the smaller towns in free delivery?

Mr. LOUD. When you get to a town of sufficient size you can prescribe the number of hours for each man to work. We will assume that in a city of 10,000, which is the minimum, there would be a sufficient amount of work for three or four carriers to perform the service——

Mr. LATIMER. Why can not the same arrangement be made in a town of 5,000 population?

Mr. LOUD. I do not think you would have more than one carrier in a town of that size.

Mr. CANNON. How about a hundred?

Mr. LOUD. Or in one, two, or three.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I have heard the gentleman denounce the rural free-delivery bureau as the most extravagant bureau, not only of this country, but of any other. Can the gentleman state whether this extravagance is due to an unnecessary number of employees or to the extravagant payment to necessary employees?

Mr. LOUD. Well, it has been pretty hard for me to determine. I will say——

Mr. HILL, The gentleman's statement was sweeping, without any restriction.

Mr. LOUD. Do not get excited. When you interrupt to ask a question, you must give me an opportunity to answer.

Mr. HILL. All right.

Mr. LOUD. I will answer it the best I can. We are paying too large salaries in some places. The main question is extravagance in supervision. I am not talking about the carrier himself.

Mr. HILL. I understand.

Mr. LOUD. I say, when you pay a salary of $3,000 for an assistant somebody, whatever you may call him, it is too much——

Mr. HILL. Very well; what about the rest of the force?

Mr. LOUD (continuing). When there is a man performing more important duties for $2,100 a year.

Mr. HILL. Is the rest of the force paid extravagantly?

Mr. LOUD. I will venture to say that the rural free-delivery clerical service in Washington is paid 25 to 30 per cent more than they would have received had they regularly entered the service as civil-service employees. Men who are getting $1,200, $1,400, and $1,500 a year, if they had entered by the regular door would have been getting $800 and $900 and $1,000.

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman think the force is larger than it should be?

Mr. LOUD. I do not know. I am quite positive that that Department is doing a great deal of work that is wholly unnecessary.

Mr. HILL. Then it must have unnecessary employees.

Mr. LOUD. You can form your own conclusion as well as I.

Mr. HILL. I would like to ask the gentleman how they got there—by what force or influence unnecessary employees were put upon them?

Mr. LOUD. I do not think they have been forced upon them. I think they were glad to get them.

Mr. HILL. I am not asking the gentleman because I have any of these appointments. I asked him if there are any in that Department by his recommendation?

Mr. LOUD. Well, I have.

Mr. HILL. I presume the gentleman has quite a number. I thought he would know all about this.

Mr. LOUD. I did not urge it; it was offered. I was asked to put him there.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman speaks in the singular number. Is his patronage limited to one?

Mr. LOUD. It is.

Mr. PEARRE. The gentleman, then, did yield to temptation?

Mr. LOUD. Permit me to say, I have prayed all my life, "Lead us not into temptation," and I hope to keep out of it; but I want to say this, that there is not a man, woman, or child in the Government service through my influence but is subject to discipline and subject to the same rules and regulations that every other one in the service is, and I have no interest in them.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACKBURN. My question is this: Under the present system of bidding on mail routes, the star routes in this country, if he puts these under contract, will it be upon the same grounds in the free delivery as it is in carrying the mail?

Mr. LOUD. We do not propose to submit it on the same ground. I hope the gentleman will read the bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have read the bill.

Mr. LOUD. The grounds are outlined in the bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the gentleman from California think it will be more efficient under his bill than to pay a salary of $600?

Mr. LOUD. I do. I think it will be more efficient than to pay $600, because $600 is not enough for some routes. I say, in some sections of the country where it costs $250 to keep a horse—and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] says it costs three hundred in his district—it only leaves a man $300 or $350 a year, and a man can not perform the service as expected for that amount of money. So I believe that under the contract system you would get a better service than under the payment of the salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. LOUD. I thought the Chair decided that I had time in which to close.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair deemed it his duty to notify the gentleman when the hour had expired.

Mr. LOUD. I understood I had unanimous consent to close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California controls the time on his side and he can yield to himself.

Mr. LOUD. I thought I had unanimous consent given me to conclude, but if not I will yield to myself without the intervention of the Chair. [Laughter.] I was about to close with a sentence when I was interrupted, ten or fifteen minutes ago, that it was but human nature that the head of a great division, involving as it does the city delivery service, the rural delivery service, and the town and village service, should have sufficient pride in it to want the service to remain under him absolutely undisturbed.

Mr. WATSON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. I believe it is a fact that at present the rural free-delivery system is not self-sustaining?

Mr. LOUD. It can not be.

Mr. WATSON. Does the gentleman think that under his system proposed in this bill it will be made self-sustaining?

Mr. LOUD. I do not.

Mr. WATSON. The gentleman thinks it could be managed at less expenditure, however?

Mr. LOUD. I think so. I think it will cost ultimately a great deal less, because, as I have suggested, I do not believe it in the power of Congress, or in the power of the Administration, to keep the salary at $600, or $700, or $800. There are some sections of the country where it is worth more than that, and on a salary basis, you must pay the lowest man what you pay the highest; you can not help that.

Now, in closing up this minority report, they include an extract from an editorial that appeared in the Philadelphia Press, a paper edited by the late Postmaster-General. He says here:

> Where mail is transported in bulk the efficiency of the service does not depend upon the individual efficiency of the employee, but on the solvency of the contractor.

He is referring to the contract system, yet it is the man who has been and is now performing just the same service as the rural carrier, and evidently he did not know it. I do not for a moment assume that Mr. Smith wrote this editorial. If you read a thousand recent editorials throughout the country, exercising your best judgment, you would think they came from the same source, the same as they did on the "Loud bill," where prepared editorials were sent out and published, as you know.

The men publishing the country newspapers were agonizing over the "Loud bill" because they thought their business would be destroyed; and yet the Post-Office Department has enforced more stringent regulations than the "Loud bill" carried, and the country publisher is still issuing his weekly edition and expressing his views undisturbed to the people of the country. The gentleman sought to criticise the service in a comparison, yet evidently did not know anything about the service he was comparing it with.

This editorial further says:

> Where mail is handled individually, efficiency is a question of the character of the individual employee handling the mail, and character can not be guaranteed by contract.

That is very true. I had just as soon, however, take a man's character if guaranteed by my friend from Indiana or my friend from Iowa as though it was guaranteed by my friend from California or by my friend from Pennsylvania. In your case you put up five hundred or a thousand dollars that his character is good and that he will perform the service, and in the other case the gentleman recommends him and has no responsibility.

Now, I say we have a civil service. I have no personal interest in this matter; I have cities in my district and I have country in my district. It does not affect me materially one way or the other. I have an interest only in the future integrity of the individual members of the House. I hope that in the future every man that may come to this body will come wholly untrammeled by any influence whatever. That is the only interest I or the committee can possibly have.

We have given the matter about three months' consideration. We have given it our best thought and have no interest in it, but are satisfied, as I say, by 15 to 2—and I think the 15, in intelligence and integrity and honesty, will compare with the 2—that this will give us as good a service as any other service can possibly be; will remove it from the field of politics and put it upon a business basis; and we believe that ultimately it will save to this country an expenditure of $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 a year.

There is no doubt that we can get good men. Why, sir, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General has only 21 assistant superintendents for the whole service. This infant bureau carries now in our appropriation bill 135 or 140 supervisors. One hundred and thirty-five or 140 men ought surely to be able to supervise 8,000 carriers as well as 21 men can supervise 37,000.

Mr. LANDIS. The gentleman does not mean supervisors, I presume; he means inspectors and agents.

Mr. LOUD. I use the term "supervisors" not in the technical sense. I mean agents and inspectors.

Mr. LANDIS. And their work is to institute this service?

Mr. LOUD. Not all of it.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him this question: If a large number of men are now employed who ought not to be employed, or if the salaries are larger than they ought to be—if there are abuses of this kind, I ask the gentleman why his committee does not bring in a bill to regulate those matters without affecting the rural carriers at all. Such a measure could receive the support of the whole House. Why not bring in a bill to reduce the salaries which are excessive and to do away with any superfluous number of employees? Why could not the abuse be corrected in that way by a separate bill?

Mr. LOUD. I suppose it could be, but that is one of the smallest abuses. I hope the gentleman is willing to permit a committee charged with the responsibility to at least make suggestions to the House—to at least give the House the benefit of their investigations. The House is not obliged to take the recommendations of the committee; there is no compulsion about it, my friend, not a bit. Is the gentleman afraid to have this matter considered in the House that he should suggest that we do something else without allowing the present measure to come up? This is a matter worthy the consideration even of my distinguished friend who has just interrupted me.

Now, the minority of the committee wind up their report by citing some star routes—why I do not know, unless it be to show that under the star-route system this service would cost more. In selecting routes as illustrations of the working of the star-route system, the minority of the committee has gone into a section of Pennsylvania where the service is most expensive—why?

When I brought this particular matter to the attention of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, he said: "Why, where did that information come from? It is not public information. The correction of mileage is not even in our advertisements. The report contains information not necessarily secret, but to which no one but my most trusted clerks have access."

Now, the average per mile in the first section, which is an expensive section, is 5.27 cents a mile. The average of the routes that the gentleman has selected is 7.52 cents a mile. Now, why did he choose those particular locations as illustrations? Did he want to be fair? He has taken routes of 1 mile, a mile and a half, and 2 miles long to show that this service would be more expensive under the contract system than under the salary system; and he takes such routes as these, the route from Pine Flats to Garmans Mills, stopping at some other places. In that case the carrier leaves at half past 7 o'clock in the morning and gets back at half past 4 o'clock in the afternoon. You must remember that these star-route contracts are regulated as to time.

The next case the gentleman takes is a route on which the carrier leaves at 6 o'clock in the morning and arrives back at half past 7 o'clock in the evening, the time occupied being thirteen hours and a half; and the Government pays $650 a year. The gentleman from Virginia wants to compare that service with the service of the man who can perform his work and go about his business at the expiration of four hours.

This is simply a sample which I took for the purpose of showing in the first place that the gentleman has not been fair even on the question of expense, which he considers the least important item because he has put it last, and I am willing to so consider it.

Mr. SWANSON. Does the gentleman say that under the contract system he believes the service could be done for less than $600 a year?

Mr. LOUD. I do not.

Mr. SWANSON. I understood the gentleman to say so.

Mr. LOUD. I can not speak as to that. In some cases the service might cost less than $600 and in other cases more.

Mr. SWANSON. I thought the gentleman had given such investigation to this subject as to have reached a conclusion.

Mr. LOUD. That is a matter about which no man could speak definitely. I am not a prophet.

Mr. SWANSON. What is the gentleman's judgment? My judgment is that the service can not be done for less than $600.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman in his report undertakes to show by comparison that the service will cost more under the contract system, but he has not been fair. That is all I am undertaking to show now. I will put in the RECORD the details as to these routes which the gentleman has taken by way of illustration. I am undertaking to show that the gentleman has not even been ingenious, because he has picked out the most expensive routes there are in the service. Here are the particulars of the routes which the gentleman has taken as illustrations:

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Let me ask the gentleman this question: We did, at one time, get this mail delivered for $300?

Mr. LOUD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And later for $400?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And still later at $500?

Mr. LOUD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Then is it not reasonable to suppose that if we should put out this service by contract some of the same men who once did the work for $300 or $400 would still be living and would be willing to perform the service at similar figures?

Mr. LOUD. I hope so; and there is another thing about this, when they lay out these rural routes—another question that has escaped me—they can lay out 20 or 21 or 22 or 23 mile routes here and there, and it always leaves bunches or sections of country that can not be served 5 or 6 or 7 miles in length. Always.

These people must forever be denied unless you can have a rural carrier there at seven or eight hundred dollars a year. That section of the country, which is a large section of this country, can not be supplied unless the man be paid the maximum salary, but under the contract system if it is 2 miles or 3 or 4 or 5 or 6 or 10 miles, whatever it may be, there are plenty of young men who would bid $100 or $150 or $200 a year, jump on a horse's back, and go and deliver the mail, or go on foot and deliver it.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman from California permit me to ask him a question right here?

Mr. LOUD. Right here or at no other place.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman objects to my asking the question here I shall do it later.

Mr. LOUD. Go ahead.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood him to make a statement that there are pieces of territory not likely to be served where the routes would run perhaps 6 or 8 or 10 miles unless the maximum salary was paid. Did I so understand the gentleman?

Mr. LOUD. Substantially.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman know that in the United States there are very many routes running from 8 to 10 or 12 or 15 miles where the salaries do not exceed $300?

Mr. LOUD. I did not know it, but I will accept the gentleman's statement for it, if he says so.

Mr. BUTLER. The record from the Department shows, Mr. Chairman, there are from 40 to 60 such routes.

Mr. LOUD. That is a good many among 8,000.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the gentleman from California what effect this bill will have upon carriers already in, as to the term of service they will continue to have?

Mr. LOUD. I will state that the bill provides that carriers who would be in the service on the 1st day of July may be continued at a salary not exceeding $600.

Mr. SIMS. Indefinitely?

Mr. LOUD. Indefinitely.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask this: Do not you think it would be well to put a limitation on that?

Mr. LOUD. Personally I should say not. I have no serious objection to putting a limitation on, but I am perfectly willing to leave that to the discretion of the Postmaster-General. I have discussed this question with some of the postal officials, and they make these suggestions, that there would be no desire to immediately disturb these carriers, not within six months, probably, or within a year. If $600, in their opinion, was just and equitable compensation the men will continue and will be permitted to continue indefinitely. If, however, it is apparent that it was not worth more than $250 or $350, in a reasonable time, in the discretion of the Post-Office Department, they would dismiss him and permit him to bid for it with other people.

Mr. SIMS. To be perfectly fair, would it not be right that people should have a right to bid for these routes that will in a reasonable time, as well as others, be let?

Mr. LOUD. I think they would, ultimately, within a reasonable time. I have no serious objection to the limitation of time, but I can see objections on both sides.

Mr. SIMS. I had heard that an amendment was going to be offered by the committee of that character and I wanted to know.

Mr. LOUD. Well, the committee will offer no amendment to this bill that I know anything about.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask if the rural system has not recently been put under what is known as civil-service law?

Mr. LOUD. I think so.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will not that divorce it as much as anything else from politics?

Mr. LOUD. I started to make a statement here about what a member of the House told me, and I have heard, in fact, several gentlemen state it, I suggested, as an argument in behalf of this bill, and I have used every argument I know, appealing to one gentleman with one argument and to another with another argument, and he raised objection to it. I said, "There is no more patronage in this question for you." He said, "Why, we will make the appointments just the same." I said, "How?" and I hope the gentleman up at the White House may hear my voice. "We have been promised."

The promise has gone forth that the members of this House in their districts shall control the patronage hereafter as in the past.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Notwithstanding the civil-service application?

Mr. LOUD. Notwithstanding the civil service. Why, the civil service is in this bureau itself.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman know of anyone to whom that promise has been made?

Mr. LANDIS. Will the gentleman give the name of the person to whom he refers?

Mr. LOUD. I will not; but it is true.

Mr. WATSON. When the gentleman says that the civil service is in this bureau now, what does he mean?

Mr. LOUD. I mean they have a chief of this civil-service division in the rural-delivery division. They have clerks there—a chief.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would say to my friend from California that no such promise or intimation of promise has ever been made to me.

Mr. WATSON. They have a clerk, appointed how?

Mr. LOUD. The same as other clerks are.

I desire to beg the pardon of the House for taking up as much time as I have. I know that this House will give this question an honest, fair consideration, taking all things into consideration, particularly the fact that it protects carriers that have been appointed—and that is a serious question with a great many people, to protect the people they have in.

We saw that illustrated when we had the census legislation here, even by men who condemned the civil service since civil service began—anxious advocates of putting their own under the blanket. So if there are any such, if there are any members who want to keep the men who are in, we have provided for them, and we think we have met every objection that possibly can be raised, and the committee can assure you, I know, and they speak through me, that after all this investigation you will have under this system an absolute and safe delivery service outside of politics. You will not get any patronage, but you will hold what you have got. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LAWRENCE having taken taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

RURAL FREE-DELIVERY SERVICE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate this committee on hearing from the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads such an exhaustive and such a forcible presentation of the case from his standpoint. I have served with the chairman of that committee, I believe, for ten years in Congress, and I desire to bear testimony to his knowledge of post-office matters, to his patriotism, to his courage, and his desire to do what is to the best interests of this country, as he conceives it. It has always been with a great deal of reluctance that I have differed with him in postal matters, but when this question was first presented to me as a member of the subcommittee, and as a member of that important committee, I could never get the consent of my mind as to the wisdom of the proposition that he proposes.

Now, I want to ask this committee to discuss this matter this afternoon dispassionately, calmly, quietly, and sensibly as to what is to the best interest of this country and to the best interests of the rural-delivery service. I am one, sir, who believes that the rural-delivery service is one of the most important services that has ever been started by this Government. I believe it has in it great blessings, and great blessings to all rural communities. I believe it will increase the value of farm lands; I believe it will increase the pleasure of country life; I believe it will prevent the great congestion of our population in the cities, which is one of the perils of our institutions and one of the great dangers of civilization to-day.

Consequently I want to discuss this service entirely from the standpoint of what is to the best interests of the rural communities affected alone by the service. Now, I recognize that it will cost a great deal of money to deliver the mail to and from all the rural communities, but I am here to say after investigation, after study on this committee for ten years, I believe if an effective and efficient rural-delivery service is put into effect in this country it will be but a short time when the rural-delivery service will more than pay for itself.

Now, to make it pay for itself you must have a really effective service. Put 400 people on a route. Pay $600 a year, and it is only a tax of a dollar and a half per year and everybody served on that route. If you will subtract from it the compensation paid to fourth-class postmasters, the compensation paid star-route service outside of rural-delivery service to-day—and that will do away with this expense when it is perfect—the expense will not be over 75 cents per capita for the population served. Now, to make the rural-delivery service pay for itself it must be effective, it must be the best service that can be rendered, and unless you do that you will get no return, you will get no increase of letters, you will have no increase of receipts.

Therefore, I believe the thing for this House, as I, as a member of the committee, discussed, is, What is the most effective system to pursue in order to make the rural-delivery service efficient? There was a great deal of criticism, when it was first inaugurated, about delivering mail in the city five and six and seven times a day, and when it was proposed there was a complaint made that it would bankrupt the Government, and yet the delivery of the mails in the cities from two to five times a day, instead of costing the Government money, has so increased the receipts of the post-office that the increased facilities in delivering and collecting mails has more than paid for itself.

When a man goes to a large city to-day, instead of sending for a messenger and paying him 25 cents, he writes a letter and puts it into the post-office, and it is delivered in a few hours. Consequently efficient service has paid in the cities; and I stand here to say that efficient service will pay in the country, and when this system has been perfected in its development I believe it is but a few years before the rural-delivery system will so increase the receipts of the Government to more than pay for itself.

The deficit of the Post-Office Department for this year, notwithstanding it has had a larger expenditure for the rural-free delivery, is less than for a number of years, and so the only issue between other members of this committee and myself is as to what will give the most efficient and effective service to the country. Now, that is what we want to attain, and when you attain that, mark me, you will attain a service that will abolish the star routes and some of the post-offices, and when it develops it will pay for itself. Consequently I can not get the consent of my mind to make at this time so radical a change in the Post-Office Department. This rural-delivery service has developed wonderfully in the last three or four years. That it has now developed is proven by the fact that there is a great and increasing demand for its extension and for its development.

Now, what does this bill propose? It proposes a radical change in the entire system without making the least experiment with reference to it and without the consent or sanction of the Department which is administering it. Now listen. In the present law there is no prohibition on the Post-Office Department to try an experiment with this contract system. I have been told by members of the Department that they intend to make an experiment where it is possible.

Mr. Chairman, what I was endeavoring to impress upon this committee was this: That this service has been in existence three or four years, and only for two years to any remarkable or very large extent. It is now in its developing, perfecting, and evoluting age. I want to say I do not believe there is a service, not even in the delivery of the cities, that has gotten the approval and support of the country as has the rural free-delivery service since it has been established. I can not get the consent of my mind to endanger this system by marking out one way in which it must be conducted in the future. When this system was first inaugurated it was sought to be diverted into a star-route system. Permission was sought to be given to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to divert it and make it a star-route system, with permission to deliver the mail between one post-office and another.

Now, I want to say that if this bill does not pass the Department is not debarred from experiment during the coming year, and testing as to whether the contract system is or is not a success. As I have said, the Department says that it is willing and intends to make an experiment in any section, in any district, or in any route that anybody desires. I was willing, as a member of this committee, that any specific sum of money be appropriated to help make the experiment of the contract system, and if it should develop what is claimed by its advocates, then, when Congress convenes next session, if the experiment had been successful and the test had proven good, the Department would have an opportunity and Congress would have an opportunity to extend it and make it peremptory and positive.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Would not the civil-service law have to be repealed?

Mr. SWANSON. Congress has the power to repeal the civil service. The President has power to repeal the civil service.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. You mean to say that the civil-service law, or whatever it is, would have to be modified before you could get this system inaugurated?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not believe that. I think they could get an efficient service and fix an eligible list and let those eligibles bid for the contract under the present law, and the Department could make the experiment of creating an eligible list and having it fixed out of the political power of the Post-Office Department, and then let the men on the eligible list bid. But if this experiment is adopted, and if this bill pass and it proves a death blow, if it should prove to be injurious or ruinous to the rural delivery, the Department has no discretion but to follow it, even if the service is destroyed before Congress convenes again.

Has not that been the experience, and has not that been the disposition that Congress has displayed on all matters as important as this, that before it made such an important departure as this to see whether it is a success, and if it is a success, then extend it and not destroy the system, but try the experiment? I told the chairman of the committee that I thought it was wise and I would consent that a specific sum of money should be appropriated to test and try the contract system and see if, as the friends claim, it would be a success, and if so, then Congress in the future should adopt it.

Mr. COWHERD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. COWHERD. The gentleman says he would be willing to try the contract system provided the present system could be kept running along. I want to ask him if, under this bill—a provision in paragraph 4 of the bill—it is not provided to continne the present system so that the contract would apply only to the new service?

Mr. SWANSON. Now, I want to show you the fallacy of this bill, the lack of business sense in its preparation. What are the routes that could be put up to the lowest bidder? They are the routes at present established. They have run for a year, or some time; it is known the length of time and the hours it will take to make the delivery on them. The Department keeps the time in which the carrier goes to office and when he comes back, and if there are any routes that ought to be let and can be safely let to a contractor it is the route that the people know the time it will take to cover the present route; and yet the very routes the men could form a judgment about—could form an estimate as to the service they would have to perform in that contract—are the very routes you refuse to let go and be offered to bidders.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. BROMWELL. The gentleman says the bill is drawn in an unbusiness-like way.

Mr. SWANSON. A portion of it.

Mr. BROMWELL. Is not the gentleman from Virginia a member of the committee?

Mr. SWANSON. I am.

Mr. BROMWELL. While the bill was under consideration, did the gentleman put in an appearance and take any part in the proceedings or attempt in any way whatever to give us the benefit of his wisdom?

Mr. SWANSON. I want to say that when the committee met I voted against the provision because I believed it was wise and proper for the friends of free rural delivery to give it an opportunity to be developed and evoluted before putting it in a straitjacket, and that the wisdom and sense of the committee would have been shown if they had waited until the system had grown and developed before trying to put it into a straitjacket. I want to say further that when the vote was taken I voted against it. I want to say further that when the committee met that I was a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I was a member of the Ways and Means Committee that had charge of the war-revenue act and the Philippine tariff bill, the Cuban reciprocity question, and all the time that I had to give, day and night, was given to those two committees.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman answer my question, whether he was present at any time and offered any advice or suggestion as to the preparation of this bill? He says he was there at the final vote on it.

Mr. SWANSON. I knew nothing about the bill until I received the notice that the committee were going to meet at 11 o'clock, and I could not attend on account of a conference with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN] and other Democrats as to the Cuban reciprocity question. I knew nothing about the bill being severed from the appropriation bill until I received notice to be there at 11 o'clock.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You were not one of the one hundred that was consulted. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROMWELL. Did not the gentleman get notice of the fact?

Mr. SWANSON. I received a notice, but the next morning I had a session or a conference with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN] and others.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me a question?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. THAYER. Is not the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads like the ordinary committees of this House, where the Republicans fashion their own bill and the Democrats can take them or leave them, as they see fit?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not believe the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads has ever had before them a bill on which they divided by party lines.

Mr. BROMWELL. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts is answered.

Mr. SWANSON. I think that committee has as little of partisan feeling as any committee of this House.

Mr. THAYER. I am glad that there is one committee of that kind in the House.

Mr. SWANSON. I want to do exact justice by that committee, and I say that I believe it is run on business principles as nearly as any committee can be run.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to ask the gentleman from Virginia why not put the city carriers on the same basis as the rural free-delivery carriers?

Mr. SWANSON. I am coming to that in a moment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Georgia just alluded to a consultation with 100 persons. I would like to ask what that means?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know anything about the consultation. I want to say that the first time the proposition was submitted to me I took the ground that I believed that it would result in an inefficient service for the rural delivery; it would result in a loss of service, a loss of money to the Government by the contract system, and I objected to it from start to finish. And since I have heard the discussion of this question by the chairman of our committee, I have been more convinced than ever that my position was right.

The position I took was that the only method you can adopt to make the rural free-delivery service pay is to make it efficient. Now, let us inquire which is the better system to make the service efficient—the contract system or the salary system? The theory always pursued by this Government heretofore has been, where personal fitness was required, to fix a salary and then secure the services of the best men that can be got for that salary. I know that human nature can not execute theories perfectly, but that is the theory on which we have proceeded. Now, let us apply that principle to the rural-delivery carriers—the same principle that has been applied in other branches of the public service.

Let us see whether personal fitness is or is not an element to be considered in the selection of rural-delivery carriers. What does the rural-delivery carrier do? There is a vast difference between a star-route carrier and a rural-delivery carrier. The star-route contractor takes a contract for carrying the mail in bulk between two specified points—office A and office B. That mail is locked up; the carrier does not handle it. He neither collects the mail nor distributes it, except that recently there has been a star-route service under which mails are delivered at boxes along the road between the two offices.

But the chairman of our committee has failed entirely to tell you that this is a personal service; that mail can not be thus delivered by the star-route contractor except upon written request from the man who is to be served, the carrier being thus made an agent, not of the Government, but of the individual who requests that his mail may be so delivered.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And that request has to be in writing?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes, it must be in writing.

Now, let us see what the rural-delivery carrier does. He collects letters; he must take mail matter which the people along the route may give him. People, of course, are most jealous as to who collects their mail; and the mail thus collected is distributed by the rural carrier, not in bulk. He sells postage stamps, and he cancels the stamps.

The chairman of the committee says that the rural carrier does not register letters; but he does give a receipt for a letter which is to be registered, and that receipt is just as effective as the receipt of the postmaster for a registered letter. He receives money for the purchase of money orders. I would like the chairman of the committee to tell me of a single duty performed by the postmaster which the rural carrier is not obliged to perform under the present system, except the issuing of money orders. And it will be but a short time before the rural-delivery carrier will be authorized to issue money orders.

Now, then, if it requires as much personal fitness to be a rural-delivery carrier as it does to be a postmaster, why do you not put your postmasterships up to the lowest bidder and let the man who will agree to do the service for the least money perform the duties of the office?

Let me go a step further. I want to tell you that the rural-delivery carriers have more personal service to render than the city carriers. A city carrier does not sell stamps; he does not receive money for money orders; he does not receive registered letters; he simply receives the mail and delivers it at the houses of the people. If personal fitness, personal aptitude, personal efficiency are required to make a man an effective city carrier it certainly requires more to make a man an effective rural-delivery carrier.

Now, these city carriers in the collection of the mail simply go to boxes and take out the mail which has been deposited there. They do not do any clerical duty. Yet they are employed upon salaries. Now, why should the rural communities be discriminated against? Why should they be subjected to competitive bidding and possibly low salaries?

If the contract system here proposed is right in one case, it is right in all. Let the gentleman from California come in here with a bill carrying out this principle in all the departments of the Government. Shall we give fish to one and stone to another? Shall we discriminate among the various employees of this Government, adopting no method of justice except to strike down the rural-delivery carrier?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentlemen allow me to suggest that this bill provides for giving the rural service not to the lowest and best bidder, but to the lowest bidder?

Mr. SWANSON. I am coming to that point in a moment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The lowest bidder may be perfectly irresponsible.

Mr. SWANSON. Now, I want every friend of the rural-delivery service to weigh well this matter before voting upon the pending bill. If the star-route system should be applied to the rural-delivery service and that service should prove to be inefficient and destructive to the best interests of the Government and the community, this system must continue until the matter can be brought to the attention of Congress and a change be authorized by law.

Now, I want to say there has not been as much complaint against the rural-delivery service, that has been in force only three or four years, as there has been against the star-route service, which has been in force since the time of Benjamin Franklin and has had every opportunity to perfect itself. I have heard less complaint and less criticism of the present rural-delivery service than has been directed against the star-route service, which has been in effect in this Government for a hundred years and has had every chance for development and for evolution.

We are told that it is going to get us out of politics, and they come and try to get the Democratic votes on this side of the Chamber under that plea. We are told that it will go to the lowest bidder, that a Democrat can bid as well as a Republican, and that consequently there can not be any politics in it, and then in the next breath they turn around and tell you it is not going to the lowest bidder because that would get men least competent, with the least industry and the poorest cart and the poorest mule and the slowest service therefor. We are then told that the Postmaster-General must be satisfied of the efficiency, the capacity, the trustworthiness, and the competency of the man before he shall appoint him.

Mr. THAYER. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. THAYER. I should like to ask whether he knows of any remonstrance having been presented to Congress or to any committee in opposition to the now present theory of rural free delivery, or whether any persons have appeared presenting objection to the scheme as now carried out and asking that it be changed to a star-route service?

Mr. SWANSON. I have not heard a single complaint before the committee. There has not been a complaint made, so far as I am aware, by a single man who has been served with the service, and I know of no demand that has been made except by the members of this committee. If there is any other demand, I have not been able to hear of it, know of it, or see it.

Mr. SPERRY. There has been none.

Mr. SWANSON. Now, as I was saying, take the bill. They do not give it to the lowest contractor. After a dozen people have bid what is the method of procedure under this bill? Twelve men have bid for it. Every one of those twelve has got to prove to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General that he is trustworthy, that he is capable, that he is competent, that he will render satisfactory service under the provisions of this bill before the award can be made.

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWANSON. In a moment. The minute that these claims are filed before the Department at once complaints, clamors, and charges will begin against the lowest bidder on the part of the community served. Who passes on that? The Postmaster-General. When there are dissensions in your district between eight or ten applicants for a place and the questions of trustworthiness, of character, of efficiency and competency, of literacy or illiteracy are involved, before the appointment can be made you will be solicited by the various applicants and their friends to take a hand, and you will be embroiled in this fight before the Post-Office Department.

Instead of taking it out of politics, instead of making it nonpartisan, instead of getting rid of the present friction in connection with it, this bill will but multiply it, will produce dissension, complaints, and charges against the various applicants in the different districts through all portions of this country.

Mr. GILBERT. Now, here is my objection to the gentleman's proposition: A Democratic Congressman in Kentucky within the last ten days has recommended five Democrats to carry the mails. They have undergone the civil-service examination required by the inspector and all five of them have been turned down, and five carriers have been selected who were indorsed by the Republican postmaster in that Democratic district. Now, is it possible that they were all more competent than the five Democrats?

Mr. SWANSON. Was that since the 1st of February?
Mr. KLUTTZ. Did they pass the civil-service examination?
Mr. GILBERT. Yes; and this occurred in Kentucky. Now, I want to know if your proposition will not result in the establishment of a Republican machine in Democratic parts of the country?
Mr. SWANSON. If that condition of affairs exists, it is not bettered by this bill. The present Postmaster-General, under the provisions of this bill, before a man can be appointed would have to pass upon the trustworthiness, the character, the capacity, and competency of that man, as much as the nonpartisan board.
Mr. GILBERT. But there were 30 applicants, and 5 of the 30 passed the examination, about half Republicans and half Democrats; and all of those selected are Republicans, and all of those that are rejected are Democrats.
Mr. SWANSON. I would say, under the circumstances, that the civil-service examination was a farce and a humbug.
Mr. CLARK. And it is everywhere else, too.
Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is just what we think it is.
Mr. SWANSON. I would say it was in that case, because the Democrats of that district were as competent as the Republicans. But I would like to know how the gentleman is going to prevent that, unless you give it entirely to the lowest bidder who is responsible, and stand on that. The chairman of the committee says he is not going to stand on that, that he is not willing to do it, and he admits that it will produce an inefficient service. It leaves the Postmaster-General instead of the civil-service board to pass upon the capacity, character, and trustworthiness of these applicants. It puts a double test.
Mr. MADDOX rose.
Mr. SWANSON. Wait a minute. It puts a double test, both of character and of price. I say you can not have a double test of that kind and leave it to a political power without having partisanship in it.
Mr. THAYER. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.
Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX].
Mr. MADDOX. In this contract do they not reserve the right now to select any or all or to reject any or all, and to give it to the party that they see fit?
Mr. SWANSON. I say under this bill the Postmaster-General is given more power to exercise partisanship and control it for the benefit of the Republican party, if he so wills, than he has under the civil-service rules promulgated since the 1st of February.
Mr. CLARK. How can he make it under the rules when he appoints all Republicans now?
Mr. SWANSON. That was before the 1st of February.
Mr. CLARK. It will go on that way until the day of judgment.
Mr. SWANSON. I should like to know whether that route was established before the 1st of February or since the 1st of February. I have stated what the rules are. I do not know whether they execute them or not.
Mr. GRIGGS. Has the Republican party changed since the 1st of February?
Mr. SWANSON. The Republican party has not changed, but you propose to give it more power than it had prior to the 1st of February by indorsing this bill. You say you are not willing to give this entire power and control where I propose to have it put. Under this bill more power is given than was possessed by them on the 1st of February.
Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say this, that under the present law—I do not know whether it is going to be executed or not—the rules put into effect the 1st of February, if executed, if carried out in spirit, I do not see how partisanship can enter into this service. The board must be composed of two Democrats and two Republicans and one person who has no politics as the fifth member of the board. It is specifically stated that no political indorsement will be received; that the politics of a man can not be inquired into; that they shall simply test the efficiency and capacity by an examination to determine whether he can register letters, whether he can read properly, whether he can write the address of letters properly, and then, under the rules, the party who is recommended by the patrons of the route shall have the preference.
Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.
Mr. SWANSON. In a minute.
Now, it seems to me I had rather trust this Administration to carry out its own rules, its own regulations, its own laws that it promulgated on the 1st of February, that makes this thing nonpartisan, than to come in here and vote for a bill which leaves the matter entirely and absolutely with the Postmaster-General to appoint every carrier that he sees proper.
If I have got to take the chances in my district, if I have got to take the chances with my people, I would rather take them under the new rules and regulations promulgated the 1st of February than under the provisions of this bill, which makes the Postmaster-General absolute master of the situation.
Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I suppose the newspaper reports from different parts of the country have not escaped the gentleman's attention, wherein it is said that the rural free-delivery service is in some sense used as a political machine. Now, I ask the gentleman if he is not proceeding upon the theory that the present system of civil service recently applied to it entirely divorces it from partisan use and eliminates the question of its being a political machine?
Mr. SWANSON. I will say that if the rules promulgated the 1st of February for the rural-delivery service are executed in spirit and in justice it will cease to be a political or partisan machine, and I stand here to say that if this bill is passed it gives the Postmaster-General more power than he possesses under the new rule.
Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia, as he is an able and observing member of the Post-Office Committee, that I should like to have him state how the law operates now. Take it in the Northern States, for instance, first, how does it operate there? And it has been charged that in the Southern States there is partisanship under the present system, an appointment of Democratic carriers by Democratic members.
Mr. SWANSON. I want to be perfectly frank with the House and I will say that under the system before the 1st of February they permitted me to name half of the carriers, and they were Democrats, and half of those named were Republicans.
Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Is that the general system throughout the South?
Mr. SWANSON. I understood that that was the system throughout the South. I do not know whether it is true or not.
Mr. KLUTTZ. It is so in North Carolina.
Mr. SWANSON. I was permitted to name half of the carriers in my district.
Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Do you know whether it was developed in the committee that it was not made a matter of politics?
Mr. SWANSON. I understood when the rural-delivery system was started that it was to be nonpolitical and nonpartisan. As to whether it has been or not, I do not know.
Mr. SHACKLEFORD. You are on that committee. Have you made any investigation?
Mr. SWANSON. I have made no investigation. I think it would be the duty of the gentleman from Missouri to investigate for himself.
Mr. SHACKLEFORD. But I am not on the committee and you are.
Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman permit me an interruption?
Mr. SWANSON. Certainly.
Mr. LLOYD. I wish to say in this connection for the benefit of the gentleman that in Missouri no Democrat has been permitted under the present system to name the carriers—any part of the carriers. In a few instances two or three have been permitted to name two or three carriers.
Mr. SWANSON. I want to say this, Mr. Chairman, that when this system was originated it was intended that the appointments should be made as they were in the Census Office; that they should be divided between the two parties. I want to say that, if it was not done that way, I do not believe it was done right, and ought not to have been done. But what I want to tell the gentleman from Missouri is, that under the new rules and regulations it can not be the least political. I want to say, after examining the new rules and regulations promulgated on the 1st of February—of course I can not say whether the Department will or will not execute them—the whole system goes out of politics. If they are not executed, then it stays in politics, but you have the Civil Service Commission to supervise it and you to enforce them.
Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does not the gentleman know that the Civil Service Commission has nothing in the world to do with it?
Mr. SWANSON. I know it has.
Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is a separate examining board of the Post-Office Department.
Mr. SWANSON. It is controlled by the central board, and that board is appointed by the Civil Service Commission. The central board passes on the examinations.
Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is a board within the Post-Office Department.
Mr. SWANSON. But appointed by the Civil Service Commission.
Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. On the recommendation of the superintendent.
Mr. CLARK. Is not this the reason of the difference that is meted out to the Southern Democrats and what may be called the border State and Northern Democrats—that the Republican machine over here does not believe there is any possibility of electing Congressmen or Representatives down South, while they hope to take our districts from us? Is not that the milk in the cocoanut?

Mr. SWANSON. There may be something in that.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. And get Southern men to help them.

Mr. SWANSON. I spurn that imputation. I pretend to be as honorable as you. I want to say that the Southern Democrat is as much a Democrat as you.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Let me say to the gentleman—and it is only fair—that I was not making any reflection upon you. I make it upon the Administration; and I say that it is evident that they are not proceeding on the same principle toward Democrats in the close districts in the North as they are toward the Democrats in the large Democratic districts of the South. I did not make a reflection upon the gentleman from Virginia. I am making it upon the Administration, and if the gentleman desires to defend the Administration against that assault, I am willing for him to make the attempt. [Applause.]

Mr. SWANSON. I have no desire——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I am making no reflection on you.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to say in response that you want to explain to the Democrats of Illinois how you can vote for a proposition that gives the very Department that you are now criticising the right to pass upon the character, capacity, and appointments of every Democrat in your district.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I am ready to do so if you give me the opportunity.

Mr. SWANSON. I will do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. When you undertake to say that the Postmaster-General—and I speak without much consideration of this bill, for I knew nothing of it until I came in—when you say that the Postmaster-General has no power to stop this, when the committee or the Department or the Postmaster-General or the man responsible for the advertising of these bids, and who approves them—how long could he continue to practice politics in the award of contracts until it would be exposed and investigated? Do you tell me that it is a case like that where a man gets into office, where they simply get into office upon the recommendation of a member of Congress, that there is the legal responsibility in that that there is in the forms of a contract?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The star routes are not in politics.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. If the gentleman from Virginia has yielded to me to go ahead and make my explanation, I will be glad to do it now, but it will take considerable time. If he has not, I will take my own time, as I hope to get it, and show the gentleman that the political machine he is helping them to install is one which any party will feel the effects of in years to come, I care not under whose administration it may be, whether under a Democratic or Republican.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I would not defend the Postmaster-General to the extent the gentleman from Illinois has. He says he is willing to leave all of this to the Postmaster-General, who is intrusted with the discharge of this matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. The gentleman must not misstate me.

Mr. SWANSON. The gentleman from Illinois said that the Postmaster-General under this bill would have absolute control of this matter; absolute control to decide whether a man was competent, capable, or not. He says he is willing to give him that power, and that he would probably discharge it. I say I am not willing to do it. I say further that I would rather leave it to the Civil Service Commission, which certainly makes a pretense of being nonpartisan, and the Post-Office Department does not.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me a question right there?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is it not true that the contract system, wherever the star-route service is now inaugurated, leaves to the Government the right to reject any and all bids, and is it not true that the star-route system has never been used for partisan or political purposes?

Mr. SWANSON. Is the gentleman through?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And will the gentleman indicate the difference between the law now controlling the contracts of the star-route system——

Mr. SWANSON. You have asked two questions, now make the third.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is all one question. Assuming that the two questions are to be answered in the affirmative, will the gentleman from Virginia state the difference between awarding the contract under the free rural delivery service, and awarding a contract to the star-route carriers so as to show this House where one could be used politically and the other not?

Mr. SWANSON. I will.

Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me a suggestion right there? Did you ever know a man in the star-route service that had sense enough to influence anybody in politics? [Laughter.]

Mr. SWANSON. Never. Now, Mr. Chairman, this question resolves itself into this, where I want to get the debate, because I want to discuss this in a businesslike way. You have either got to leave the Postmaster-General absolute control of the matter, and give him the power to make it a political machine, reject any and all bids upon his own partisanship, or you have got to leave it to the lowest bidder who is responsible and can give bond.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. If the gentleman from Virginia will allow me, I suppose the gentleman has already stated that under an honest enforcement of the regulations now in force in the Department, especially if they have fair and competent inspectors, it would be impossible to use this rural free-delivery system for partisan advantage. Now, would not the gentleman and the friends of the present system be willing to enact those provisions in the law rather than to have the system damaged by a contract system?

Mr. SWANSON. I have alluded to the fact that if the present rules and regulations promulgated are executed in spirit, if not violated, if there is at least an execution in half the spirit, it will be a removal from politics. I take this position, that you have got to leave it to the Postmaster-General to make it a political machine when he passes on the character, capacity, and competency, and involving every Congressman in it, or you are bound to leave it to the lowest responsible bidder and get that kind of a service. Now, which are you going to do? I am not willing to leave it to the Postmaster-General to increase his power and make it a vast political machine, subject to his whim and his caprice. If he has got the power to break down the service, if he has the power to drag down the rules and regulations promulgated by the President, he will do it more, and ten times more, when this bill passes and he is given absolute power.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Up to how recently has the Administration had the complete control and selection without reference to the civil service?

Mr. SWANSON. Since the 1st of February.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. They had the power then to use politics?

Mr. SWANSON. That is right.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I will ask, if this is a fair question, how many carriers the gentleman has in his district?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know the exact number, but I suppose 30 or 40.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. How many appointed on your recommendation?

Mr. SWANSON. I was told they should be divided half and half between the two parties, and I suppose they were.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Were the others appointed against your protest?

Mr. SWANSON. Half were named mostly by the Democratic chairmen, and the others by the Republicans.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. How were the 15 appointed whom you did not recommend?

Mr. SWANSON. They were recommended by the Republican chairmen.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Then the appointees were divided equally between the two parties?

Mr. SWANSON. Divided about equally.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. That is not the rule which has been followed in my district.

Mr. SWANSON. I think it has been the rule in most of the Southern States.

Mr. KLUTTZ. That was the rule in North Carolina.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It has been the rule wherever there is practically no Republican party.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have understood that the appointee must be petitioned for by the people who are to be served.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish gentlemen to understand this matter correctly. Let them read the rules and regulations requiring a nonpartisan board appointed by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Has such a board been appointed?

Mr. SWANSON. I think so.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Does the gentleman know any of the members of the board?

Mr. SWANSON. I know that one of them was appointed from my district. The members were divided half and half between the Democrats and the Republicans.

A MEMBER. Was the appointee to whom the gentleman refers his own secretary?

Mr. SWANSON. He was up to the 1st of last November. There is nothing in this matter which I wish to keep from the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. What effect will the civil-service system have upon this question in your district?

Mr. SWANSON. Under the civil-service rule those now in the service will be kept in, and under this bill it is proposed to keep them all in. There is no difference in that respect. If there are 25 Republicans in this service in the gentleman's district to-day, the bill of the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] will keep them there.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Comparing the present system with the system which will prevail under the operation of this bill, what advantage will the one offer over the other for the manipulation of the Congressmen of the district?

Mr. SWANSON. I was going to discuss that.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want the gentleman to do so.

Mr. SWANSON. There has been an effort to make Democratic members believe that if this bill passes we are going to get this matter out of politics. I say that there is but one way that you can get this question out of politics. If you will put this service under precisely the same regulations as the star-route service, you can get the question out of politics; because under the star-routes service the contract is given to the lowest responsible bidder, regardless of the question whether he can read or write and regardless of his personal fitness otherwise.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But under the star-route system the Postmaster-General can reject any and all bids.

Mr. SWANSON. Only where the bidder is irresponsible.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But the Postmaster-General is the judge of that.

Mr. SWANSON. The star-route service does not require trustworthiness; it does not require the contractor to be able to read or write; does not make any inquiry whether the contractor is a good or a bad man. The only test ever made in the star-route service is, Is the man able to deliver the mail in bulk from one office to another, and is he a responsible bidder, and can he give a good bond?

If you are willing to put the rural-delivery service on that basis—to require only what is required under the star-route service—in that way you can get this question out of politics.

Mr. GRIGGS. I understood the gentleman to say that under the star-route service the only requirement is that the bidder shall be able to deliver the mail in bulk.

Mr. SWANSON. That is right. He must be a responsible bidder for that service.

Mr. GRIGGS. Then that is the only test made?

Mr. SWANSON. The only one I ever heard of the Department making.

Mr. GRIGGS. The test prescribed under this proposed law is that he shall be able to deliver the mail satisfactorily to the individual?

Mr. SWANSON. No, sir; the bidder must satisfy the Postmaster-General that he is trustworthy. The gentleman has not read the bill.

Mr. GRIGGS. I understood the gentleman to say that the service must be satisfactory to the patrons of the route.

Mr. SWANSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I said the Postmaster-General. Now listen to the language of the bill:

Who shall furnish evidence satisfactory to the Postmaster-General——

Mr. GRIGGS. What must the bidder do under the star-route system?

Mr. SWANSON. All that is required of him is that he shall be the lowest bidder, and then upon his giving bond he gets the contract.

Mr. CLARK. If the law should add to the qualifications of the mail carrier under the star-route system the further requirement that he shall be able to read and write, would not the matter be then so fixed as to be taken absolutely out of the domain of politics?

Mr. SWANSON. Not at all.

Mr. CLARK. Why not?

Mr. SWANSON. I will tell you.

Mr. CLARK. As many Democrats can read and write as Republicans, and more, too, down in my district. [Laughter.]

Mr. SWANSON. I will tell you why. Will you permit me now?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. You say this bill will take it out of politics more than the present civil-service regulations, promulgated on the 1st of February.

Mr. CLARK. That is what I say.

Mr. SWANSON. Now, let us see. Under this bill the Postmaster-General passes on the question as to whether a man can read or write; he passes on his trustworthiness, on his character, and on his capacity. He is given full scope to exercise his political preference. Under the civil-service rules or regulations a board appointed by the Civil Service Commission passes on precisely the same question.

Mr. CLARK. Why do you not answer the question that I ask you?

Mr. SWANSON. I do. I say the only difference between you and me is that I would prefer that the Civil Service Commission pass on that question of trustworthiness and of character and of qualification rather than the Postmaster-General.

Mr. CLARK. I know; but why do you not answer the question that I ask you—that if it is added to the qualification of a star-route carrier that he shall be able to read and write, if that would not take it entirely out of the domain of politics?

Mr. SWANSON. I say it would not take it out of the domain of politics, because under this bill you would have to satisfy the Postmaster-General, whoever was appointed, that he was a man of good character and trustworthiness and had these various elements of character; you would have to go before him, and evidence has got to be furnished him; you have got to file evidence before him.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman says that the only way to remove this matter from politics is to put it on the same basis as the star-route service. Does that gentleman know that under the star-route service the greatest frauds occurred that have ever been perpetrated in this country?

Mr. SWANSON. That is right, Mr. Chairman. I say there is no way to take it out of politics except to put it under civil-service rule, as the new rules provide, or put it up to the lowest responsible bidder and leave no discretion about it whatever.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is put up to the lowest bidder.

Mr. SWANSON. It is not. You must not have read the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I have.

Mr. SWANSON. The bill leaves it entirely to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, and if he wants——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Who is to judge of the responsibility except the Postmaster-General? And it limits it by confining the responsibility to certain specific things. It is better than if it used the broad language of responsibility.

Mr. SWANSON. You make the Postmaster-General the judge of character, the judge of trustworthiness, the judge of everything that comes before him. Let me ask you this question——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Are not character and trustworthiness a part of responsibility?

Mr. SWANSON. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. They are not? Oh, I thought they were.

Mr. SWANSON. Responsibility arises where a man gives a bond that he will do a certain duty. But you let the Postmaster-General go into the test of personal fitness, he has to pass on the question of personal fitness. I say I had rather have the personal fitness tried by the Civil Service Commission, that pretends to be out of politics, than by a Republican Postmaster-General. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us go further——

Mr. HILL. The Postmaster-General under this bill not only has the power to prescribe his fitness, but it is within his power to make regulations as to substitute carriers, so that by a series of straw bids one man can take the entire contracts for the United States.

Mr. SWANSON. Possibly that is true. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us go further. Now, put it down to the lowest bidder and say that is going to be the result.

Mr. GRIGGS. Will my friend permit a question right there?

Mr. SWANSON. I will.

Mr. GRIGGS. I understood my friend from Connecticut to say that by some sort or series of bids, secondary bids, some hocus-pocus, one way or another, one man could finally secure the contract for the entire United States. Is that it?

Mr. HILL. That is precisely the case. If the gentleman will explain the language of this clause on page 3:

Provided, That no person shall be awarded a contract for more than one route under this paragraph"——

Mr. GRIGGS. What page is that?

Mr. HILL. Page 3. Why don't you say "under this bill?"

Mr. CLARK. If that is all the trouble there is, why don't you offer an amendment making it "the bill?"

Mr. HILL. That is only the beginning of the trouble. It is rotten all the way through.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask for the floor, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the floor.

Mr. GRIGGS. Will my friend from Virginia permit me one more statement?

Mr. SWANSON. I have taken more time now than I wanted to. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GRIGGS. Will my friend from Virginia permit me?

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield any more. I have been very liberal in yielding. I want to conclude. The gentleman has his own time.

Mr. GRIGGS. I will give some of my time to the gentleman.

Mr. SWANSON. I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. GRIGGS. I understood the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] to ask you the question that I just put a moment ago, to which you assented?

Mr. SWANSON. Under that provision about a substitute——

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes; that under this bill a contract for the entire service in the United States could be awarded to one man. Is that true?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know, unless it could be under the substitute provision. I have not read that carefully. You and the gentleman from Connecticut can decide that for yourselves.

Mr. GRIGGS. You assented to it?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know. I have not read it. I am not deciding between you and the gentleman from Connecticut. [Laughter.] I want gentlemen on this side who favor this bill to see the position in which they put themselves. Here is what the Postmaster-General has promulgated, and here is what the President, who controls the Postmaster-General, has promulgated for governing this service since February. Now listen. Here are the rules promulgated by the President, and the Postmaster-General, to whom you are willing to trust this matter:

> Under no circumstances must political or religious affiliations of applicants be considered, nor can political indorsements be received or entertained. The merit of the applicant and the good of the service alone must be considered in submitting recommendations.

Now, that is the rule that went into effect the 1st of February. If the Postmaster-General can be trusted to pass on the character and capacity of contractors—as this bill provides—it seems to me he ought to be trusted to execute his own rules and regulations which he has promulgated in a nonpartisan way.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Did not the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] call your attention a moment ago to a specific instance in which these rules that you state have been promulgated were violated?

Mr. SWANSON. If he will violate his own rules and regulations, that he has issued and that the President has issued, he will violate the rules when it comes to the question of contractors, and you increase his power more effectively and more efficiently by this bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If he will violate his own rules within thirty days after they are promulgated, what will he do when a political campaign is on?

Mr. BURLESON. I suggest to the gentleman that he get the date when this incident in Kentucky occurred.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. He said the applicants stood the examination; and they had no examination to stand before the 1st of February.

Mr. SWANSON. I know nothing of that case. But I say to these gentlemen on this side who think that they are taking this question out of politics by supporting this bill that they are mistaken, and they will find, if they will read the provisions of this bill, that they are simply increasing the power for partisan politics.

Now, if it goes to the lowest responsible bidder, you will have an inefficient service, because the man who has less to do, the man who has less address, the man who has less energy, the man who has the poorest cart and the sorriest mule, can bid less than the man can who is willing to give better service, and consequently he will get the job. It will be just as it is in the star-route service. Everybody knows there is a general complaint about the inefficiency of the star-route service, as to the character of the carts, mules, horses, and the persons who render the service. Whenever the roads are muddy and slow, and traveling is difficult, everybody knows that frequently the mail does not reach the post-office under the star-route system. It is deficient.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What objection has the gentleman from Virginia to making these rules a part of the statute?

Mr. SWANSON. None in the world. I should be glad to have them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why don't you offer that sort of an amendment?

Mr. SWANSON. They have been promulgated, and are the existing rules. The rules of the Civil Service Commission are law until repealed, and there is a doubt as to whether the President had the right to repeal them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But these are mere rules. Will the gentleman offer them as an amendment?

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And put in a penalty for disobeying the law.

Mr. BURLESON. As I understand it, the appointments made in the district of Kentucky are in the district represented by Mr. TRIMBLE. He can give the facts as to whether they were made before the 1st of February or not.

Mr. GILBERT. As I understand it, no examinations were had. The recommendations were made. As there is some misapprehension as to the statement I made a while ago, since then I have had an interview with my colleague [Mr. TRIMBLE]. Before the 1st of February he recommended 5 mail carriers, and since the 1st of February the 5 Democrats have been turned down, and 5 Republicans have been designated upon the recommendation of the Republican postmaster. The examinations were not had, but the recommendations were before the 1st of February in both instances, and 5 Democrats were rejected and 5 Republicans were selected.

Mr. SWANSON. I would state to the gentleman under those circumstances I would refer this case to the Civil Service Commission, which has charge of the matter, naming the parties, stating the facts, and bringing it before the Civil Service Commission. This country ought to know whether these rules are to be executed or are a mere pretense, and we will see if these rules are to be executed. All I ask is for any man to read these rules, and I am satisfied that if they are executed in spirit there can be no partisanship, as there ought not to be in the rural free-delivery service of this country, and as it was understood that there would not be when the service was first started.

I want to say that if the gentleman from Kentucky will give the Civil Service Commission the names of the gentlemen appointed and file his complaint the Civil Service Commission can make an investigation and see whether these rules are effective or whether they are mere pretense——

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman from Virginia will permit me, I will state I received information yesterday of the appointment of two carriers in my district, both Democrats.

Mr. SWANSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will proceed to discuss my objection to this bill. If you pass it you will leave to the Department finally to test the character and capacity of the men who are to carry the mail, and it makes it more partisan and less satisfactory; and if you leave it to the Civil Service Commission it leaves it nonpartisan and out of politics. If we leave it entirely to the lowest bidder who is responsible and able to give bond, it lessens the character, the capacity, and efficiency. If it is left entirely to the lowest bidder, I believe it will destroy the efficiency of the service.

The man who is the least competent, the least capable, who has got the poorest address, the poorest cart, the least equipped to perform the service, is the man who can bid to do it for the least. Consequently, I say, whichever horn of the dilemma you take, you are either bound to increase the politics and partisanship in it by passing this bill or compelled to decrease the efficiency of the service by giving it to the lowest bidder. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Put these rules into the RECORD, so that we can read them.

Mr. SWANSON. I will.

Now, Mr. Chairman, where is the great complaint about the efficiency of this service. There has been complaint from Missouri, from Tennessee, and from some other States about its being used for partisan and political purposes. All of these complaints that I have heard do not apply to the efficiency or desirability of the service, but to the partisan appointment of carriers. All this occurred before it was put under civil service. I say you can get no benefit from the conditions that confront you by any such bill as this. I would rather take my chances under the Civil Service Commission or appeal to the Civil Service Commission, for if they have violated any of the regulations since the 1st of February, they will right them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What Civil Service Commission is it?

Mr. SWANSON. The present Civil Service Commission.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is there a new Commission that has charge of it?

Mr. SWANSON. No; it is the present Civil Service Commission.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, is not there a new board to pass upon this?

Mr. SWANSON. They have a board under them known as the central board, but the Civil Service Commission has absolute control of this board and appoints it, I understand, and you may appeal to the Commission.

Now, let us see the objections to and the reasons for this bill. The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] said that one reason for this bill is because it is impossible to fix the proper compensation for the rural carrier on account of the difference and great diversity in the routes. Let us see whether that is true or not. Let us see if you can not fix the basis of pay of rural carriers as well as of the city carriers. The route can be established; they keep the time-table, the time when a man starts and when he gets back, and they can form an average at the end of the year of the time that is taken to carry the mail on this specific route.

If it takes only six hours they can enlarge it until it takes eight.

They can fix the route so it will take about eight hours as well as they can fix the route in the city. It is just as practicable to fix the time tables for a carrier in the country under the system that has been developed and evoluted and perfect it as it is in the city. It can be fixed in proportion to the time taken to render the service. For instance, if it takes eight hours and the pay of the man is $600—take it on a route that has only taken four hours—they could pay him $300. You can fix the route, as the Department is doing to-day, in proportion to the time taken.

It would seem to me that on that basis it can be fixed just as well and just as effectively as it can be fixed where the carrier is in the city. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have detained this committee much longer than I expected. I am satisfied that if you will get an effective rural free-delivery service, one that can be developed and evoluted, one that can carry the mail to all the people in this country that want it, in three or four years that service is going to pay for itself.

As I said, if 400 people in the country are served to-day, if you subtract from it the star-route service that is abolished and the post-offices that are abolished the tax would not be 75 cents per capita on the people served. The increased letters at 2 cents apiece, which a man would use on account of the increased efficiency on account of the daily service, brought to his door, would more than pay for this. That has been the experience from the delivery in the cities, and I am satisfied it is going to be the experience of the delivery in the country.

Take another view of it. Under this bill, at any time after a man has contracted to deliver the mail he can throw it up in thirty days by notifying the Government, and the Government has to re-let it again to the highest bidder. Every fellow that has got no job and simply wants a makeshift, simply wants employment for a few months, can afford to underbid his neighbor and get it and then throw it up. He can take the job in good weather, and after he has had it three months or gets something else to do he can serve notice on the Government that he wishes to surrender the job, and it must be re-let. Under this condition, in the time of snows and hail and the winter winds, when the work is disagreeable, there will be many who will surrender jobs.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And the rural people have got to go without their mail.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; and that is the very time that they want it, when snows and inclement weather comes. Think of it, letting this great service to people for no specific length of time, and of permitting rules which would allow a contractor to give thirty days' notice, when he anticipates bad months, and quit. The Weather Bureau prophecy of bad weather during winter would be followed by many resignations.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman think that any carrier would be justified in quitting his job on a notice from the Weather Bureau? [Laughter.]

Mr. SWANSON. Well, he might have some hesitancy about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the carrier give a bond?

Mr. SWANSON. He gives a bond, but this bill allows him to resign in thirty days.

Mr. COWHERD. Can not the rural-delivery carrier resign now?

Mr. SWANSON. They can at once appoint a man——

Mr. COWHERD. Is there not a provision in this bill under which the Postmaster-General can arrange for a substitute?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There is always a substitute carrier.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; the law provides for a substitute carrier. If such rules exist, the Postmaster-General can give thirty days' notice, and in that way, if he wishes, get rid of any Democratic carrier who may be appointed under this bill.

Mr. SIMS. If this bill should be passed, ought there not to be a reletting upon routes where this service is already established? Ought not the service there, as elsewhere, be given out upon contract?

Mr. SWANSON. I say that if there is any reason for putting any route under the contract system, it is better that the rule should be applied on routes already established than on new ones. Yet under this bill it is provided that the service may be continued upon such routes, and at the same time it is provided that upon new routes, where one does not know the number of hours required for the service, or anything about the number of horses necessary to do the work, it is provided that in these cases the service shall be put up to the lowest bidder.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman has said that these carriers may resign at any time. Will he point out the clause of the bill under which that may be done?

Mr. SWANSON. Under the general law I suppose, and I so understood from the remarks of the chairman of the committee whom I never knew to make a mistake in regard to a matter of that kind.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I find nothing of that character in the bill.

Mr. LOUD. I simply said that the bidder could make a contract for a year or for such a time as might be agreed upon.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In other words, a man could contract for less than a year's service; but he could not resign during the term for which he had contracted without liability on his bond.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I thought not.

Mr. SWANSON. The proposition as I have understood is that on thirty days' notice either the contractor or the Government could cancel the contract. I supposed that was the intention of the bill. The report of the majority so states.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope my friend will take up those civil-service rules which he started to read a few moments ago and explain their operation. They are new, and we may want to make them a part of this bill to-morrow.

Mr. SWANSON. I will put them in the RECORD.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Can not the gentleman explain them to the House now?

Mr. SWANSON. Any member of the House can obtain a copy of those rules at the Department.

Now, Mr. Chairman, another difficulty about this bill is that every time that you want to extend a route, every time that you wish to increase the service so as to include persons not before included, the contract will have to be re-let. The contractor would have no assurance that he would again receive the contract under a reletting. He would always have an uncertain tenure. His friends would be more or less opposed to any extension of the service, as it might cause him to lose his job. Consequently there would be a retardation of the development and operation of this service.

Mr. CLARK. Is it not a fact with regard to the existing star-route service that the Government has a perfect right to make a change whenever it pleases?

Mr. SWANSON. That is so.

Mr. CLARK. Then could the rural carriers be placed in any worse fix than that in which the star-route carriers are liable to be placed?

Mr. SWANSON. If we want to put the rural-mail delivery upon the same basis as the star-route service, the gentleman is right. But I do not wish to make the rural-delivery service an exact counterpart of the star-route service. I want to make it better.

Mr. CLARK. One other question. The gentleman says, as I understand, that the routes already established are those which should especially be subjected to this bidding, because, except on an established route, no one could tell the actual amount of service to be rendered. Does not the gentleman believe that any citizen living along a given route could take up a piece of paper and a lead pencil and in thirty minutes cipher out the amount of service and how much ought to be paid?

Mr. SWANSON. He could not. His time would often depend upon the number of letters to be registered, the number of money orders to be purchased, and other irregular work by the carrier, etc. A contractor on a star route wants to get through as quickly as possible and render as little service as possible, carrying as few letters as possible, selling as few money orders as possible. He would not feel under any obligations to be specially pleasant or accommodating to the patrons of the route. But when, under the existing system, a man undertakes this rural-delivery service he feels a responsibility resting upon him to make that service effective and satisfactory to his patrons. He is anxious to be pleasant and accommodating.

I am satisfied that in this way there is an important difference between a contractor and a salaried carrier. I want to appeal to the friends of the free rural-delivery service who are satisfied that this service is a success, who are satisfied that it has benefited the Government and benefited its patrons, let us stand by it and let it develop and let it evolute, and I believe that in less than five years that service will more than pay what it costs this Government in increased receipts. It will benefit country life. I see no reason why rural-delivery service should be put up to competitive bids, so as to get inefficient and incompetent service. It is entitled to as efficient and competent service as is had in any other department of this Government.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman one question before he sits down. It is this: Assuming that the Administration is going to select men who agree with it in politics as carriers, can the gentleman see a distinction between having a carrier at a good round sum per annum, out of which he could make a nice contribution to a campaign fund, and having a carrier who has gotten his contract under a competitive bid that would prevent him from making such a contribution?

Mr. SWANSON. I would say that if he got it under a competitive bid in which he was not the lowest bidder, but on account of the Postmaster-General saying that he was of better character and was more trustworthy than the lowest bidder, as this bill permits, he would feel under more obligations than he would if he was an appointed and salaried carrier.

Mr. KLUTTZ. The Postmaster-General could select men who could give that service.

Mr. SIMS. I want to show this, the way that they have been doing it in Tennessee. The First and Second districts are represented by Republicans. In the First there are 104; in the Second, 43; in the Third, 6; in the Fourth, none; in the Fifth, 20; in the Sixth, 19; in the Seventh, 28; in the Eighth, none; in the Ninth, 5, and the Tenth, 1. Now, what kind of an administration is that which treats these districts in that way under the present law?

Mr. SWANSON. I think it is very unfair and unjust and inequitable, but I think when you pass this bill you give them a power still greater to do that. I would like to know how this bill is going to change that.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Those routes were established under the old regulations before the 1st of February.

Mr. SWANSON. I would like to ask the gentleman how does this bill change that and prevent the Department from exercising that same discrimination?

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman think he could make it any worse by any bill?

Mr. PADGETT. Must not that depend very largely upon the number of petitions sent out?

Mr. SIMS. In the Fourth district there were five and not one established, and in the Eighth district there were eighteen petitions and but one established.

Mr. SWANSON. The position I take is that this bill does not prevent in one iota any such administration of the law. You simply increase it, and I say it is wise for people who want to take it out of politics, who want to make it nonpartisan, who want to make it serve the people, to give the new rules under civil service a fair show. [Applause.]

I believe this bill will be destructive of an efficient and good rural-delivery service. The Department will be unable to discipline contractors as well as they can carriers appointed and salaried. It will prevent its development and growth. It will, by reducing its efficiency, prevent its becoming self-sustaining. I am unwilling to make so radical a change on conjecture and experiment. I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] that I would like at this time to bring up the conference report on the Philippine tariff bill, if he has no objection to the committee rising at this time.

Mr. LOUD. I will make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11728) to classify the rural free-delivery service and fix the compensation of employees thereof, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report, and I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report and that the statement be read in its stead.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report and that the statement be read. Without objection, this course will be pursued. The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the statement.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5833) temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out of the matter inserted by said amendment the word "exportation" and insert in lieu thereof "shipment;" strike out the word "now" in line 15 of the matter inserted by said amendment; after the word "duty," in the matter inserted by said amendment, insert "under the provisions of this act," and strike out, in line 16 of the matter inserted by said amendment, the word "exported" and insert "coming;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the amendment after the word "further," in line 2 of the matter inserted, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the Philippine Commission shall be authorized and empowered to issue licenses to engage in lighterage or other exclusive harbor business to vessels or other craft actually engaged in such business at the date of the passage of this act, and to vessels or other craft built in the Philippine Islands or in the United States and owned by citizens of the United States or by inhabitants of the Philippine Islands;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all the section and insert in lieu thereof a new section, as follows: "That the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of revenues,' approved June 10, 1890, as amended by an act entitled 'An act to provide for the government and to encourage the industries of the United States,' approved July 24, 1897, shall apply to all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Archipelago;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the matter inserted by said amendment after the word "court," in line 5; and the Senate agree to the same.

SERENO E. PAYNE,
JOHN DALZELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

H. C. LODGE,
W. B. ALLISON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

Statement of the managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to H. R. 5833.

The managers on the part of the House agree to amendment No. 1, with certain changes in the phraseology in order to make it conform to the decision of the Supreme Court in the insular cases.

Amendment No. 2 limits the imposition of tonnage taxes to foreign vessels instead of all vessels, including those of the United States; and the House agrees to the same.

The Senate recedes from its disagreement to amendment No. 3; and the House agrees to the same.

Amendment No. 4 fixes the time of the suspension of the navigation laws in reference to vessels engaging in the coastwise trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States, and limits it to July 1, 1904.

Amendment No. 5 relates to vessels and other craft engaging in lighterage in the Philippine Islands. The House agrees to a substitute for said amendment, which authorizes the Philippine Commission to issue licenses to all vessels engaged in lighterage and harbor business on the passage of the act, and also to vessels of the Philippine Islands and of the United States.

Amendments Nos. 6, 7, 8, and 9 relate merely to the phraseology and do not alter substantially the House bill; and the House recedes from its disagreement and agrees to the same.

Amendment No. 10 inserts the word "foreign" before vessels, the same as amendment No. 2; and the House agrees to the same.

Amendment No. 11 provides for the refund of internal-revenue taxes collected on articles shipped to the Philippine Islands after November 15, 1901, and appropriates money for the payment thereof; and the House agrees to the same.

Amendment No. 12 is an immaterial change in the phraseology.

Amendment No. 13 authorizes a return of duties, less 1 per cent, paid upon goods, which are in bonded warehouses, to be shipped to the Philippine Islands; and the House agrees to the same.

Amendment No. 14 is a new section, and the conferees struck out the matter inserted by the Senate and substituted a new section therefor, extending all the provisions of the administrative laws to goods coming from the Philippine Islands to the United States.

The House agrees to amendment No. 15, striking out the proviso.

SERENO E. PAYNE,
JOHN DALZELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] if any debate is desired on that side of the House?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes; we want a little time to debate it.

Mr. PAYNE. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. How much time does the gentleman purpose giving on the bill for debate?

Mr. PAYNE. So far as I am concerned, I want about five minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There are several gentlemen here who desire to be heard, and I could not agree now to fix the limit of debate.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, then, Mr. Speaker, I think I will keep control of the time. I want to say a word.

Up to the time of the assembling of Congress the Government had been collecting, on goods coming from the Philippine Archipelago into the United States, the full Dingley rates. On the 2d of December the Supreme Court handed down a decision that under the Dingley law we were not entitled to collect any duties on goods coming into the United States from those islands.

In the meantime the Philippine Commission had passed a general tariff bill for goods coming into the Philippine Islands and also imposing certain export duties on goods shipped from these islands. It seemed important to the Committee on Ways and Means, as soon as it was organized, to report a bill to the House to preserve, as far as possible, the status quo which had existed before the decision of the Supreme Court and also to turn into the Philippine treasury all of the collections made on goods coming from the islands into the United States. Such a bill was reported, and passed the House on the 17th of December, just before the holiday recess.

About that time the report of the Philippine Commission had been received and was put into the hands of the printer. I think I said, in answer to a question of some gentleman on the other side, that I had seen that report. That was true, and I supposed I had read all that was said in that report upon the tariff question.

What I had then read was sent to me under a separate cover. It related only to the tariff imposed upon goods coming into the Philippine Islands, and did not relate to those goods coming from the islands into the United States; and I did not then know that the Philippine Commission had recommended that there be a rebate of the duties on the goods coming from the Philippine Islands; so that while I was acting entirely in good faith, and while I had seen the report, I had not read that part of it.

Subsequently that report was received and went to the Senate, and on the recommendation of that report the Senate made a rebate of 25 per cent of the duties on goods coming from the Philippine Islands, and also abolished the export duty on goods coming from those islands to the United States, both of which provisions are included in amendment No. 1; and with some verbal amendments, making changes in the phraseology, we have agreed to that amendment.

It was fortunate, I think, that the House passed the bill on the 17th of December, as I was informed that but for the passage of that bill some parties in the United States had arranged for the formation of a syndicate to bring in a shipload of tobacco while it could come in here free; but because of the promptness of the action of the House, and looking for something like that same promptness in the Senate, they did not think it well to make the venture; so that very few goods have come in up to this time. I am anxious that this bill may become a law as soon as possible, in order that the tariff may affect whatever goods come through, in order that the insular treasury may get the benefit of those duties.

As to the other amendments of the Senate, one of them provides that the tonnage taxes which we had imposed should apply only to foreign vessels engaged in the trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States. They also limit the time for the suspension of our coastwise navigation laws to the 1st of July, 1904, to which provision the House agrees.

They also attempted to give the right of appeal in cases arising under the tariff on goods coming from the Philippine Islands to the United States, and we have adopted a substitute for that which applies all the administrative laws to the subject of goods coming from the Philippine Islands to the United States.

In addition to that the Senate passed a section which had no reference whatever to the tariff or to revenue or anything else in the bill. In the first place, they enacted a portion of the Constitution of the United States, and we did not object to their putting that in this bill. That provision was—

> That no person in the Philippine Islands shall, under the authority of the United States, be convicted of treason by any tribunal, civil or military, unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.

To that portion of the amendment the House conferees have agreed, and it is contained in the report. They also added a proviso:

> Provided, That there shall be no conviction or punishment under the authority of the United States by any tribunal, civil or military, of any mother or father for failing to give information against his or her child, or of any son or daughter for failing to give information against his or her mother or father, or of any husband failing to give information against his wife, or of any wife for failing to give information against her husband.

We did not see the necessity of that amendment and did not agree to it, and the Senate has receded from it. The Senate has adopted the conference report. That is all I wish to say at this time, and I will yield to the gentleman——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman if the practical effect of the adoption of this conference report is to establish a tariff between the Philippine Islands and the United States of 75 per cent of the Dingley rates?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; on goods coming from there here.

Now I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee thirty minutes, if he desires it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would rather take the floor in my own right in opposition to the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I think I will control the floor, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not think we ought to be called upon to pass this bill in such haste. This is a bill of considerable importance, and it ought to be discussed, it seems to me.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman seems to forget that this bill passed about two months ago, and it is only here on the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have not forgotten that. Why not let it go over until to-morrow and pass it then?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think there is any difficulty about passing it to-night. I will yield thirty minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not see how there could be any objection to that. We had only two days' debate upon this matter.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman ought to remember that this is only a temporary measure. Does the gentleman desire the thirty minutes?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have some demands for time. I do not think they can be heard within thirty minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield the gentleman thirty minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not think we can present our opposition to this bill in thirty minutes. I think we ought to have an hour, although we may not use all of it. There is one gentleman who desired to speak on the conference report who was called away this afternoon and will not be back, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

Mr. PAYNE. I will yield thirty minutes to the gentleman, if he desires it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And one other gentleman who was to have spoken is not here, or is not in his seat. We are taken by surprise by taking this bill up this afternoon.

Mr. PAYNE. I can not yield the gentleman more than thirty minutes. If he does not want to take it, why——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is absolutely impossible to discuss this bill with two or three gentlemen in thirty minutes. I will not take the floor, occupy one-third of the time, and then yield to other gentlemen. If we can only have thirty minutes, why, you may call the roll on the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question, then.

The question was taken on ordering the previous question; and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. PAYNE. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 62.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and forty-seven gentlemen present; not a quorum.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. PAYNE. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 81.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers on the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that that is not in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There is no quorum present. That forces the call of the roll under the rules.

The SPEAKER. Under the special rule applying to such cases, the yeas and nays will be ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Before you commence the call, I would like to appeal to the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Tennessee and the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I demand the regular order. I think there is nothing in order but the call.

Mr. CANNON. I was trying to reach unanimous consent.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman should have been in if he has any lecture to deliver.

Mr. CANNON. There is no lecture about it.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will be in order, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 105, nays 84, answering "present" 10, not voting 157; as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 4, 1902.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SCOTT, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal, without objection, will stand approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 23, 1902, a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, inclosing a list of lands withdrawn by order of the Commissioner of the General Land

Office and stating the causes for which such withdrawals were made; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

EXCISE BOARD OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting a report of the operations of the excise board of the District of Columbia for the license year ending October 31, 1901; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

SCHOONER BETSEY AND LUCY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims, set out in the findings by the court relating to the vessel schooner Betsey and Lucy, Joseph Crown, master; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SENATORS FROM IOWA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of WILLIAM B. ALLISON, chosen by the legislature of the State of Iowa a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1903; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of JONATHAN P. DOLLIVER, chosen by the legislature of the State of Iowa a Senator from that State for the remainder of the term beginning March 4, 1901; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to inquire whether it is not necessary for the newly elected Senator to be sworn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it will be necessary whenever he comes in. The junior Senator from Iowa is not in the Chamber at present.

Mr. DOLLIVER was subsequently escorted to the Vice-President's desk by Mr. ALLISON, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. CARMACK. I present a joint resolution of the legislature of Tennessee, favoring the election of United States Senators by popular vote. I ask that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint resolution No. 40.

Whereas a large number of State legislatures have at various times adopted memorials and resolutions in favor of election of United States Senators by popular vote; and

Whereas the National House of Representatives has on four separate occasions, within recent years, adopted resolutions in favor of this proposed change in the method of electing United States Senators, which was not adopted by the Senate; and

Whereas Article V of the Constitution of the United States provides that Congress, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, and believing there is a general desire upon the part of the citizens of the State of Tennessee that the United States Senators should be elected by a direct vote of the people: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate, the house concurring, That the general assembly of the State of Tennessee favors the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution which shall provide for the election of United States Senators by popular vote, and joins with other States of the Union in respectfully requesting that a convention be called for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as provided in article 5 of the said Constitution, which amendment shall provide for a change in the present method of electing United States Senators, so that they can be chosen in each State by a direct vote of the people.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution and application to Congress for the calling of a convention be sent to the secretary of state of each State of the United States, and that a similar copy be sent to the President of the United States Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Adopted March 20, 1901.

NEWTON H. WHITE,
Speaker of the Senate.

E. B. WILSON,
Speaker of the House.

Approved, March 27, 1901.

BENTON MCMILLIN, Governor.

EFFICIENCY OF THE MILITIA.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That 500 copies of public act No. 30, to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States, be printed for the use of the Senate.

CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION BUILDINGS.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate bill 3129, a bill of a few words and a matter of charity.

Mr. HALE. After the Senator from Vermont is through with this matter I hope we may do what we did yesterday, the wisdom of which was proved by the great progress which we made with the Calendar. I hope that we may go to the Calendar and take the bills in order, and we shall very nearly get through with it by the end of the morning hour to-day. I do not make the point now, but I shall do so after the Senator has called up this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks for the present consideration of a bill which will be read.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 3129) for the authorization of the erection of buildings by the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations on military reservations of the United States, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOAR. I should like to reserve objection until the amendment has been read, if I may. I will wait until that has been dealt with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The amendment was read, which was, in line 4, after the word "permission," to insert "by revocable license;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That authority is hereby given to the Secretary of War to grant permission by revocable license to the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations of North America to erect and maintain, on the military reservations within the United States or its island possessions, such buildings as their work for the promotion of the social, physical, intellectual, and moral welfare of the garrisons may require, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may impose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I think this presents a pretty serious question. Of course no man can fail to be eagerly desirous that such work as these associations propose shall be encouraged; but we have had some rather unpleasant experiences when yielding to that motive in permitting any Christian sect to have peculiar opportunities for its own charitable and religious work on public grounds.

For instance, General Grant, with that great kindness of heart and desire for the public advantage which always animated him, granted to the different religious organizations the function of teaching Indian schools, and the result was that after we had gone on several years we were obliged to abandon that policy by reason, I will not say of the jealousies, but the discontents which prevailed among different Christian sects.

Now, is the Young Men's Christian Association an association which admits all religious persons of any faith, or all Christian persons, I will say? For instance, does it admit Catholics?

Mr. PROCTOR. It does, I understand.

Mr. HOAR. Does it admit Unitarians?

Mr. PROCTOR. It is not denominational at all. It admits everybody. It is for the benefit of the soldiers generally.

Mr. HOAR. I have been told, perhaps without authority, that its constitution prohibits any person from having a share in its management except what are known as members of evangelical churches. If that be true, I should still make no objection to the bill, if it is expected that any other association of Christian bodies shall be permitted to do the same thing.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, other religious bodies have been permitted for a great many years to do this same thing. There are Catholic churches on military reservations, all by revocable rights, just as this proposes, and in some cases the licenses have been revoked to the extent that the location has been changed where the ground was required for military purposes. I see no possible harm in it. It is especially used for the social and physical features. They conduct no religious services whatever.

Mr. HOAR. I do not object to that, of course.

Mr. PROCTOR. It is, one might say, an innocent amusement hall for the benefit of the soldiers. It is entirely under the control of the Secretary of War at any time, and is revocable by license.

Mr. HOAR. I was thinking of moving to insert the words "or to any other religious association that he may approve," but on the statement of my honorable friend, which we all, of course, would trust, that it is not intended to make this an exclusive privilege——

Mr. PROCTOR. Not at all.

Mr. HOAR. But other bodies reasonably equipped and reasonably certain to carry out the work would be likely to have the same privilege——

Mr. PROCTOR. They have had it for years.

Mr. HOAR. I will not interpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. I presume the Senator will have no objection after the words "authority is hereby given to the Secretary of War" to insert "in his discretion." I presume he will exercise it, but it may be claimed that the act does not give that authority.

Mr. PROCTOR. There is no objection to that amendment whatever.

Mr. HALE. I think that helps it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee will first be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, after the word "permission," insert the words "by revocable license."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine offers an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 3, after the word "War," insert "in his discretion."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATISTICS OF TRADE.

Mr. HALE. Now, let the Secretary announce the first bill on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order. The occupant of the chair asks that a bill which has been passed over at his request, being Senate bill 2479, be considered, it having been understood that where bills were passed over at any time they could be called up.

Mr. CARMACK. What was the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. That we proceed with the Calendar. The first Calendar number is 376.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill was passed over at a former time, without prejudice.

Mr. HALE. There is no objection to going back to it.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2479) to facilitate the procurement of statistics of trade between the United States and noncontiguous territory over which it exercises control, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Commerce instructed the occupant of the Chair to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the bill. The amendment will be read:

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That this law shall not apply in the Philippine Islands during such time as the collectors of customs of those islands are under the jurisdiction of the War Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Committee on Commerce will be stated in their order.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 1, strike out the word "other" and insert in lieu "its other noncontiguous," so as to read:

That the provisions of sections 4197 to 4200, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, requiring statements of quantity and value of goods carried by vessels clearing from the United States to foreign ports, shall be extended to and govern, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, in the trade between the United States and Hawaii, Porto Rico, Alaska, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and its other noncontiguous territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "territory," in line 1, page 2, to strike out the words "not contiguous to the United States which is or shall be controlled by the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to inquire what bill this is. I have just come into the Chamber from committee work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a bill to obtain custom-house statistics in outlying territories, desired by the Statistical Bureau.

Mr. TELLER. What committee does it come from.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BACON. What was that amendment, if I may be pardoned for asking?

The SECRETARY. On page 2, lines 1, 2, and 3, strike out after the word "territory" the following:

Not contiguous to the United States which is or shall be controlled by the United States.

Mr. BACON. That is not the amendment I refer to. It is the prior amendment, in reference to the Philippines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That this law shall not apply in the Philippine Islands during such time as the collectors of customs of those islands are under the jurisdiction of the War Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The War Department is gathering the statistics now and communicating them to the Treasury Department.

Mr. BACON. The provision is made on the ground that it is unnecessary?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 5 strike out the word "the," in the center of the line, and insert "other parts of the;" so as to read:

and shall also govern in the trade conducted between said island and territory, and in shipments from said islands or territory to other parts of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to facilitate the procurement of statistics of trade between the United States and its noncontiguous territory."

ALPHONSO M. POTVIN.

The bill (S. 918) for the relief of Alphonso M. Potvin was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that that may be passed over, as it is included in the claims bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without prejudice?

Mr. WARREN. Without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

MILLE LAC CHIPPEWA INDIANS.

Mr. NELSON. The other day the bill (S. 590) for the relief of the Mille Lac Chippewa Indians, in the State of Minnesota, went over at the request of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. I ask unanimous consent that it may be taken up now. It is a local bill and the Senator from Connecticut, at whose request it went over, is now here.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill what is to become of the land upon which the Indian improvements are now and which are to be paid for? Who will get the benefit of those improvements?

Mr. NELSON. Unfortunately these lands have already been taken by homestead settlers, and the Indians are remaining there without any title at all. They are squatters. They lost the land years ago, and this is to give them pay for their improvements and remove them to the White Earth Reservation.

Mr. COCKRELL. And to donate the improvements to the settlers?

Mr. NELSON. The settlers have already homestead entries on the lands.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do they get the improvements? Do they go and settle upon the lands where the Indians had their buildings and improvements upon them?

Mr. NELSON. The settlers took homesteads there, and the Indians remained squatting on the land. They had made improvements before that time.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand that the settlers went and made homesteads on the land where the Indians were occupying them, with buildings upon them?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; and those homesteads have been approved by the Land Office.

Mr. COCKRELL. Were they Indian lands before?

Mr. NELSON. No; they were supposed to be Indian lands, but they were not. By an old treaty, in 1867, they were ceded to the United States absolutely, but with one condition, that the Indians could remain and occupy the lands as long as they were well-behaved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The amendment was in section 2, on page 2, line 4, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered, through such agent or agents as he may appoint therefor, to cause to be investigated, examined, and appraised all the improvements made by the Mille Lac Indians, or any of them, upon the lands occupied by them on said Mille Lac Indian Reservation in the State of Minnesota. And when such investigation, examination, and appraisal has been approved and allowed by the Secretary of the Interior, he is hereby authorized and directed to pay to said Indians, upon the condition of their removing from said Mille Lac Reservation, the amount of the compensation appraised and allowed, as aforesaid.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the amount appraised and allowed to said Indians under the provisions of the foregoing section.

SEC. 3. That the said Indians, upon removing from said Mille Lac Reservation, shall be permitted to take up their residence and obtain allotments in severalty, either on the White Earth Reservation or on any of the ceded Indian reservations in the State of Minnesota on which allotments are made to Indians.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Senator from Minnesota ought to state some reason why the amount is doubled.

Mr. NELSON. That is the recommendation of the Committee on Indian Affairs. The bill was originally for $25,000, but the committee thought that was not sufficient and that a larger margin was needed. I am not responsible for the amendment of the committee; they recommended it. It was their opinion, after consulting the Indian authorities, that the amount should be increased to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATUS OF BILLS PASSED OVER.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that bills which are passed over without prejudice may be called up by a Senator at any time when the Calendar is under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

JERONEMUS S. UNDERHILL.

The bill (S. 208) for the relief of Jeronemus S. Underhill was announced as next in order.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the bill be passed over for the time being.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over without prejudice.

TREASURY SETTLEMENTS.

The bill (S. 2604) to pay certain Treasury settlements was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the following Treasury settlements:

To the Magnolia Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Cincinnati, Charles Hofer, receiver, for amount paid to owners of steamer Neptune, $2,333.33 (No. 432; settlement 5318 of 1885).

To Charles Hofer, receiver of the Magnolia Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Cincinnati, for moneys paid to the owners of the steamer Forest Queen, $3,000 (Nos. 430 and 432; settlement 5363 of 1885).

To Henry M. Cist, receiver of the City Insurance Company of Cincinnati, for money paid to owners of same steamer, $3,000 (same settlement as last named).

For sums paid upon the loss of the steamer Forest Queen, namely: To the National Insurance Company of Cincinnati, $3,000; to the American Insurance Company of Cincinnati, $4,000; to Joseph W. Wayne, assignee of the Central Insurance Company of Cincinnati, $3,000 (Nos. 423, 438, and 431, settlement 5088 of 1884).

To the American Insurance Company of Cincinnati, for amount paid to the owners of the steamer Neptune, $4,667 (No. 428, settlement 5085 of 1884).

Mr. ALLISON. I will ask the Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the Committee on Claims, to explain these Treasury settlements. I do not quite understand why they have not been paid before and what they relate to.

Mr. WARREN. There is a long report, and, perhaps, it will be necessary to read portions of the report.

A similar bill, I may state, has passed this body and the other House a number of times, but I am not relying upon that.

The matter occurred in this way. Certain steamboats, previously insured by insurance companies in Cincinnati, Ohio, were impressed into the military service, and were lost while in the service under circumstances which rendered the Government liable for their full value under the statutes relating to them. Upon presentation of the claims of the owners of the boats, and upon satisfactory evidence of the liability of the Government and the value of the boats, the Auditor and Comptroller deducted from the value so found the amount which had been previously paid to the owners by the insurance companies under the policies of insurance. Subsequently the insurance companies filed claims, claiming that they were entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the owners of the steamboats for that portion of the value of the boats which the accounting officers had deducted in settlement with the owners.

It further appears that the Attorney-General had given an opinion (Opinions of the Attorney-General, vol. 13, p. 182) that insurance companies were entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the owners of steamboats lost in the military service when the companies had paid the insurance on the boats so lost. He refers in his opinion to several decisions of the Supreme Court in support of his position. Under this opinion and decisions of the courts the accounting officers made the awards in favor of the claims embraced in the pending bill, and they were reported to Congress. The papers are all here, and, if necessary, parts of them may be read.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHAUNCEY M. LOCKWOOD.

The bill (S. 925) for the relief of the legal representatives of Chauncey M. Lockwood was announced as next in order.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DURHAM, N. C.

The bill (S. 2897) providing for the erection of a public building in the city of Durham, N. C., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $100,000 to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase or acquire by condemnation proceedings a site for a building to be erected thereon, and to cause to be erected at the city of Durham, N. C., a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the United States courts, revenue office, post-office, and other Government offices in that city, with fireproof vaults extending to each story.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

G. H. SOWDER.

The bill (S. 1928) for the relief of G. H. Sowder was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to G. H. Sowder, of Pineville, Bell County, Ky., administrator of the estate of B. H. Sowder, deceased, failing mail contractor, $567.77, the amount due to the estate of B. H. Sowder, as shown by the records of the Auditor's Office for the Post-Office Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LARABEE & ALLEN.

The bill (S. 1024) for the relief of Larabee & Allen was announced as next in order.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that that bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask if that bill has also been included in the omnibus claims bill?

Mr. WARREN. This bill and the other bills I have asked to have passed over are in the omnibus claims bill, and therefore I should like to have them passed over for the present.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have that fact stated so that we can ascertain why it is that they are passed over.

Mr. WARREN. I will state, while on my feet, that that is true of every bill I have asked to have passed over this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

ASSAY OFFICE AT PROVO CITY, UTAH.

The bill (S. 150) for the establishment of an assay office at Provo City, Utah, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. Let that bill go over without prejudice, Mr. President.

Mr. RAWLINS. What was the request of the Senator from Iowa, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks that the bill may be passed over for the present without prejudice.

Mr. RAWLINS. I hope the Senator from Iowa will let that bill go through.

Mr. ALLISON. My attention has not been called to the bill. Bills for the establishment of assay offices are usually referred to the Committee on Finance, which has jurisdiction of the subject. I should like to look into the bill.

Mr. RAWLINS. I hope the Senator will not object to the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. As I say, my attention had not been called to this bill until this morning, and I desire an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. RAWLINS. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], who is chairman of the Committee on Finance, called attention to that matter, and, upon investigation, I think he has no desire to insist that the bill shall be referred to the Committee on Finance. It was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, probably through inadvertence, and that committee reported it favorably.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the bill may be passed over without prejudice. I do not know, after examination, that I shall have any objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

LEONARD L. DIETRICK.

The bill (S. 306) for the relief of Leonard L. Dietrick was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Leonard L. Dietrick, late first lieutenant, Thirty-fourth Infantry, United States Volunteers, $120, said sum having been United States funds stolen from his safe at Penaranda, Nueva Ecija, P. I., at some time between December 3, 1900, and December 24, 1900, while he was acting commissary officer, and which sum Leonard L. Dietrick repaid to the proper officer of the United States from his own private funds.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF CHARLES M. ROBERTS, DECEASED.

The bill (S. 172) for the relief of the estate of Charles M. Roberts, deceased, was announced as next order.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that that bill may be passed over, as it is in the omnibus claims bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT JUDGE IN SEVENTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT.

The bill (S. 3220) providing an additional circuit judge in the seventh judicial circuit was announced as next in order.

Mr. CULLOM. That bill really, as I understand, provides for a district judge, and not for a circuit judge. I therefore ask that it be passed over without prejudice, in the hope that the Judiciary Committee may change the bill before its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

ESTATE OF ELI AYERS, DECEASED.

The bill (S. 877) to quiet the titles of certain lands in the State of Mississippi, and for the relief of the estate of Eli Ayers, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let that bill be passed over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

SALVADOR COSTA.

The bill (S. 2731) for the relief of Salvador Costa was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to refer the claim of Salvador Costa to the Court of Claims and vests jurisdiction in the court to hear and determine the same, and directs that all the papers, proofs, evidence, and documents pertaining thereto on the files of the Senate be transmitted to the court to be used at the trial of the cause, in conjunction with such other testimony and proof as may be produced at the hearing. And if the court shall find that Salvador Costa is justly entitled to recover anything for his sloop Mary Lawrence, or for the use thereof, then it shall render judgment in favor of the claimant for such amount as in the opinion of the court he is fully, fairly, and equitably entitled to, but without interest upon his claim; but no statute of limitation shall apply to the right of recovery by the claimant, and each party shall have the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSION INDIANS OF CALIFORNIA.

The bill (S. 3536) for the relief of certain Mission Indians of California, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BARD. I ask that that bill be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

NATIONAL CEMETERY NEAR PENSACOLA, FLA.

The bill (S. 458) making an appropriation for completing the construction of the road to the national cemetery near Pensacola, Fla., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $32,000 for the purpose of completing the construction of the roadway from Pensacola, Fla., to the national cemetery near that city, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask where this railroad is to run?

Mr. MALLORY. It is not a railroad; it is a carriage road.

Mr. LODGE. I thought the bill was read "railway."

Mr. MALLORY and Mr. BATE. No; a roadway.

Mr. LODGE. I thought it was read "railway."

Mr. MALLORY. No.

Mr. BATE. It is for the completion of the construction of a road to the national cemetery near Pensacola, Fla. It was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs unanimously.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. I have no objection to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID M'MURTRIE GREGG.

The bill (S. 1879) authorizing the appointment and retirement of David McMurtrie Gregg as a captain in the United States Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that in view of the long and faithful services of David McMurtrie Gregg, brevet major-general of the United States Volunteers, before and during the late war of the rebellion, especially for gallant conduct at the battle of Gettysburg, and his participation and gallant conduct in forty or more battles and engagements, as shown by the records of the War Department, the President be authorized to nominate and, by and with the consent of the Senate, to appoint him to the position of captain in the Army of the United States, and to place him on the retired list as of that grade, the retired list being increased in number to that extent; and suspends all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith for this purpose only; but from and after the passage of this act no pension shall be paid to David McMurtrie Gregg, nor shall any compensation be paid him for any period prior to his appointment under this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF CHAUNCEY M. LOCKWOOD.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I have just come into the Senate Chamber, and I ask whether the bill (S. 925) for the relief of the legal representatives of Chauncey M. Lockwood has been passed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was passed over without prejudice.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask that the bill may be now considered.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from Oregon that my only reason for asking that the bill be passed over was that it was included in the omnibus claims bill. I do not know that there is any objection to passing it either here or in the other House, but the claims bill has already passed the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is disposed of?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; and I thought it would be better to let the bill remain on the Calendar for the present.

Mr. MITCHELL. Perhaps that will be better.

ELIZABETH MUHLEMAN.

The bill (S. 2216) for the relief of Elizabeth Muhleman, widow, and the heirs at law of Samuel A. Muhleman, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Elizabeth Muhleman, widow, and the heirs at law of Samuel A. Muhleman, deceased, $5,000, in full compensation for the death of Samuel A. Muhleman on February 14, 1898, caused by injury received on the 9th day of June 1893, while employed as a clerk in the Record and Pension Office, War Department, while located in Ford's Theater at the time of its collapse.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LINCOLN W. TIBBETTS.

The bill (S. 2037) for the relief of Lincoln W. Tibbetts was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $15,000 to Lincoln W. Tibbetts, of Portland, Me., in full settlement and satisfaction of his claim for losses sustained by him in bringing back to New York the cargo of the brig Tornado, consisting of 8,000 kegs of gunpowder, shipped by the brig Tornado from the port to New Orleans in December, 1860, of which he was master and managing owner, whereby the powder was prevented from falling into the hands of the authorities of the seceding States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed

CHARLES HURRLE.

Mr. WARREN. The Senate passed over yesterday the bill (S. 2122) for the relief of Charles Hurrle. A similar bill has passed the House of Representatives and been referred to the Committee on Claims. I now wish to report that bill and substitute it for the Senate bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no. You want to have the House bill passed and have the Senate bill postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WARREN. I say, I want to have the House bill passed in lieu of the Senate bill now on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is right.

Mr. WARREN. I now report from the Committee on Claims the bill (H. R. 7035) for the relief of Charles Hurrle, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Charles Hurrle, late of Troop E, Sixth United States Cavalry, for extra duty as post interpreter at Fort Apache, Ariz., from October 29, 1879, to May 4, 1881, inclusive, at the rate of 50 cents per day, and from May 5, 1881, to June 30, 1881, inclusive, at the rate of $75 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Order of Business 466, being the bill (S. 2122) for the relief of Charles Hurrle, will be postponed indefinitely, in the absence of objection. The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

MONONGAHELA RIVER BRIDGE.

The bill (H. R. 5801) to authorize the St. Clair Terminal Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

L. A. NOYES.

The bill (S. 3546) for the relief of L. A. Noyes was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $1,819 to L. A. Noyes for services rendered as acting assistant Treasury agent at the island of St. George, Alaska, from August 1, 1886, to May 30, 1887, inclusive.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

G. B. BRACKETT.

The bill (S. 4012) to authorize G. B. Brackett, Pomologist Department of Agriculture, to accept the decoration tendered to him by the Government of the French Republic was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes G. B. Brackett, Pomologist Department of Agriculture, to accept the decoration of the Ordre du Merite Agricole, tendered to him through the Department of State of the United States by the Government of the French Republic.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REORGANIZATION OF THE CONSULAR SERVICE.

The bill (S. 1618) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill will be passed over without prejudice.

LIGHT AND FOG SIGNAL AT CRISPS POINT, LAKE SUPERIOR.

The bill (S. 3491) providing for a light and fog-signal station on or near Crisps Point, Lake Superior, Michigan, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the establishment of a light and fog-signal station on or near Crisps Point, Lake Superior, Michigan, at an expense of not exceeding $18,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT OYSTER BAYOU, LOUISIANA.

The bill (S. 3312) for the establishment of a light-house at the mouth of Oyster Bayou, near the Louisiana coast, in the Gulf of Mexico, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate not exceeding $5,000 for the establishment at the mouth of Oyster Bayou, near the Louisiana coast, in the Gulf of Mexico, of a light-house.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT STATION ON BLUFF SHOAL, NORTH CAROLINA.

The bill (H. R. 199) for the establishment of a light station on Bluff Shoal, Pamlico Sound, North Carolina, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1901, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the words "Northwest Point Royal Shoal light station, North Carolina: For rebuilding this light-house, $30,000," and inserting in place thereof the following:

"For rebuilding the light-house now at Northwest Point Royal Shoal, North Carolina, at a point on or near Bluff Shoal, Pamlico Sound, North Carolina, $30,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1901."

PORT OF ENTRY AT GREAT FALLS, MONT.

The bill (S. 3746) to amend section 2593 of the Revised Statutes, relating to ports of entry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 2593, Revised Statutes, so as to read as follows:

SEC. 2593. There shall be in the States of Montana and Idaho one collection district, as follows:

The district of Montana and Idaho to comprise the States of Montana and Idaho, and the port of entry shall be Great Falls, Mont.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LINDLEY C. KENT AND JOSEPH JENKINS.

The bill (S. 905) for the relief of Lindley C. Kent and Joseph Jenkins, as the sureties of Frank A. Webb, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that Lindley C. Kent and Joseph Jenkins, sureties upon the bond of Frank A. Webb for the faithful performance of his contract for the construction, erection, and delivery of buildings for the new Port Penn light station, Delaware (Fourth light-house district), having by failure on the part of said Webb been obliged to complete the contract themselves for said Webb, but at their own expense, and having by such unexpected failure of the contractor not only been put to great extra cost in such work, but also been by the terms of the contract subjected to a very heavy penalty for delayed completion of the work, due to Webb's failure and not to any fault of their own, a penalty far in excess of the actual extra expense thereby caused to the United States, be released from so much of the penalty as is in excess of the actual extra expense to the United States by reason of the delays; and directs the engineer of the Fourth light-house district to pay to Lindley C. Kent and Joseph Jenkins the unpaid balance of the full amount of the contract, less the aforesaid actual extra expense to the United States by reason of the delays; but payment shall not be made until the engineer is satisfied that all materials used and all labor employed in the construction of the buildings have been duly paid for.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RASMUSSEN & STREHLOW.

The bill (H. R. 5106) for the relief of Rasmussen & Strehlow was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $15,000 for the relief of Rasmussen & Strehlow, contractors on Government work, on account of damages done to the main Government building at the Pan-American Exposition grounds by the cyclonic storm of September 12, 1900.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. KITTREDGE, February 20, 1902, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5106) for the relief of Rasmussen & Strehlow, beg leave to submit the following report and recommend that said bill be passed:

On the 12th day of September, 1900, a cyclonic storm materially damaged the main building at the Pan-American Exposition grounds at Buffalo, N. Y. Rasmussen & Strehlow were the contractors for the construction of this building, authorized by the Government to be constructed in accordance with the plans and specifications made by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, or under his direction. The construction provided for a building of a very temporary character and because of this fact was unable to resist the storm above mentioned. The contractors were unable to secure insurance against wind storms or cyclones while the building was in an unfinished state, and it is clearly established that the damage was not on account of any carelessness of the contractors. The contractors immediately notified the Supervising Architect of the Treasury of the loss, and such officer immediately sent representatives from his office, who made careful estimates of the cost of replacing the damaged portions and fixed the damage at the sum of $15,000. The allowance of this claim is recommended by the Supervising Architect, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT-KEEPER'S DWELLING AT CALUMET HARBOR, ILLINOIS.

The bill (H. R. 7675) to construct a light-house keeper's dwelling at Calumet Harbor was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 6, after the word "dollars," to insert:

And to carry out the provisions of this act the amount of $7,500 appropriated by the act approved July 1, 1898, to establish a light station at or near the north Government pier at South Milwaukee, Lake Michigan, Wisconsin, is hereby made available.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to have constructed a light-house keeper's dwelling at Calumet Harbor, Lake Michigan, Illinois, at a cost not to exceed the sum of $7,500. And to carry out the provisions of this act the amount of $7,500 appropriated by the act approved July 1, 1898, to establish a light station at or near the north Government pier at South Milwaukee, Lake Michigan, Wisconsin, is hereby available.

Mr. ALLISON. Does that bill merely provide for the construction of a dwelling for a light-house keeper, or does it include other things? I did not quite gather the full intent from the reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It provides for the construction of a keeper's dwelling.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

Mr. ALLISON. A dwelling for a light-house keeper, I think, ought to be built for a less sum than $7,500; and I move to strike out "$7,500" and insert "$3,500."

Mr. ELKINS. Has that bill been reported by the Committee on Commerce?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been.

Mr. ELKINS. It seems to me that we ought to follow the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury in this matter. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN] who reported the bill is not in the Chamber, but I will send for him.

Mr. BURROWS. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] reported the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I only know that as a rule $3,500 is quite an adequate sum for a light-house keeper's dwelling.

Mr. ELKINS. I was thinking of another bill, if the Senator from Iowa will pardon me.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. And that is the only reason why I interrupted. I was thinking of another bill relating to Michigan.

Mr. ALLISON. If this includes nothing but a dwelling, it seems to me $7,500 is a larger sum than is necessary.

Mr. ELKINS. It is. I agree with the Senator from Iowa. I do not remember this bill. I was thinking of one reported by the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN], but it did not contain an appropriation for that sum—$7,500.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Iowa allow the report to be read?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, February 20, 1902, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7675) to construct a light-house keeper's dwelling at Calumet Harbor, report the same back to the Senate with an amendment and recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

The act as it passed the House carries no appropriation, and there is an urgent need for the construction of a keeper's dwelling at Calumet Pierhead, Lake Michigan, Illinois. By the act approved July 1, 1898, $7,500 was appropriated to establish a light station at or near the north Government pier at South Milwaukee, Lake Michigan, Wisconsin. The Light-House Board reports that there is no apparent necessity for establishing such a light at South Milwaukee, and advises that the $7,500 appropriated for that purpose be used for the light-house keeper's dwelling at Calumet Harbor. The bill has been amended accordingly.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 11, 1902.

SIR: This Department has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from your committee, dated January 8, 1902, inclosing for suggestions a copy of H. R. bill No. 7675, providing for a light-keeper's dwelling at Calumet Harbor, Lake Michigan, Illinois.

In reply, the Department begs to state that the matter was referred to the Light-House Board, which reports that the following clipping from page 152 of its annual report for 1901 renews the recommendations made in its annual reports for 1899 and 1900, that $7,500 be appropriated for the erection of a suitable dwelling for the keepers of this station.

"'Calumet Pierhead, Lake Michigan, Illinois.—Minor repairs were made.

"'The Board in its annual report for 1899 stated that—

"'The dwelling is in a deplorable condition, unfit for human habitation. It is estimated that a new dwelling can be built for $7,500, and recommendation is made that an appropriation of that amount be made therefor.'

"The following recommendation made in the Board's annual report for 1900 is renewed:

"'The Board now recommends that authority be obtained from Congress to use the $7,500 appropriated by the act approved on July 1, 1898, for establishing a light station at or near the north Government pier at South Milwaukee, Lake Michigan, Wisconsin, to establish a keeper's dwelling at Calumet Pierhead, as the necessity for establishing a light at South Milwaukee is not now apparent, and the need of a keeper's dwelling at Calumet Pierhead is greater than ever before.'

"The dwelling is much worse than ever before. It is urgently recommended that an appropriation be made of the $7,500 needed to make these quarters habitable."

The Department concurs with the Board in this recommendation.

Respectfully,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE,
United States Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. That does not change my opinion at all. Seven thousand five hundred dollars is a larger sum than I have heard of being appropriated for a keeper's dwelling.

Mr. ELKINS. Let the bill lie over.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suppose it was just convenient to use this $7,500, because it had been appropriated for a light-house at a certain point where there was no earthly necessity for it. The authorities refused to expend it there, as there was no necessity for a light-house at the place designated, and it is now proposed to turn it over, all of it in a body, for the dwelling at this place.

Mr. ELKINS. That is a large-sized reflection on the committee. I ask that the bill lie over.

Mr. BATE. Pardon me. Can not the purpose be reached by saying that so much of the sum heretofore appropriated as may be necessary may be used for this purpose, without saying the whole amount?

Mr. ELKINS. "So much as may be necessary."

Mr. ALLISON. This is a House bill——

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not reflecting upon the committee. It is the committee reflecting upon itself.

Mr. ELKINS. You have been interpreting it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have been reading what the committee has reported about its own action.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not remember this bill, but at the same time it is very strongly recommended by the Treasury Department. However, I agree with the Senator from Iowa that it is a large sum for a keeper's dwelling.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] moves an amendment to strike out "$7,500" and insert "$3,500." Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to. Will not another amendment be required?

Mr. BATE. I understand the original act made an appropriation of a specific sum. There ought to be something said in this bill, it seems to me, to show the sum to be appropriated. Seven thousand five hundred dollars was appropriated heretofore.

Mr. ALLISON. "Of the sum heretofore appropriated, $3,500 may be used for this purpose." That is my idea. I do not see why this sum is reappropriated when it has not been used for the purpose for which it was appropriated. Why should we not appropriate directly enough money to build the dwelling?

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the better way.

Mr. ALLISON. That would seem to me to be the way to do it, but still I do not want to interfere too much.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In line 6 of the amendment, after the word "act," the insertion of the words "so much of" would fix it.

Mr. COCKRELL. That would not do, because it would still leave the $7,500 in line 6:

At a cost not to exceed the sum of $7,500.

Strike out "$7,500" and insert "$3,500," and then you have no trouble.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then disagree to the other amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, and disagree to the other amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 6 it is proposed to strike out "seven" and insert "three;" so as to read "$3,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then disagree to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendment reported by the committee will be disagreed to.

The Chair hears none.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

LIFE-SAVING STATION AT BOGUE INLET, NORTH CAROLINA,

The bill (H. R. 61) to authorize the establishment of a life-saving station at or near Bogue Inlet, North Carolina, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report in the case be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, February 20, 1902, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 61) to authorize the establishing of a life-saving station at or near Bogue Inlet, North Carolina, beg leave to submit the following report and recommend that said bill do pass without amendment:

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury and the report of the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service are hereto attached.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 15, 1902.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th ultimo, transmitting House bill No. 61, to authorize the establishment of a life-saving station at or near Bogue Inlet, North Carolina, and asking for suggestions touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

In reply I have to state that the matter was referred to the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service for report, which has been received and is herewith transmitted with my concurrence.

Respectfully,

L. J. GAGE,
Secretary.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT OF LIFE-SAVING SERVICE,
Washington, January 15, 1902.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt from you, for report, of a letter from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, transmitting House bill 61, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, to authorize the establishment of a life-saving station at or near Bogue Inlet, North Carolina, and asking for suggestions touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

Under date of February 11, 1901, in compliance with a like request, I made a report to you on a bill from the same committee, of like import, H. R. 4480, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, in which I said:

"In reply I would respectfully say that Bogue Inlet lies between Cape Lookout and Cape Fear, which points include Onslow Bay. There is a life-saving station at the point of each cape, but there is none on the coast lying between them, a distance of about 100 miles. Bogue Inlet lies about 35 miles to the westward of Cape Lookout. Considerable commerce passes in and out of the inlet, and quite a number of disasters have occurred in its immediate neighborhood, involving losses which the presence of a life-saving station would have either averted or materially lessened.

"Besides the question of affording protection to the commerce above referred to should also be considered the liability of vessels passing the Lookout or the Frying Pan Shoals through stress of weather and ocean currents, to get into the bight of the bay and so fall in with the land and its dangers, as occurred in two instances during the last fiscal year, when the schooners Carrie L. Davis and Thomas L. James, the former bound from Savannah to Philadelphia and the latter from Savannah to Rondout, N. Y., went ashore at Bogue Inlet, one being totally wrecked, suffering the loss of both vessel and cargo, amounting to $26,000, and the other the loss of the entire cargo and damage to the vessel, amounting in all to $7,000.

"An officer of the service who was recently in the vicinity of Bogue Inlet informs me that he learned that the commerce passing through the inlet had largely increased of late and is likely to still further increase.

"In view of the foregoing, the establishment of the life-saving station contemplated by the bill would seem to be desirable."

This report was transmitted to the committee, with your concurrence, on the same day, and I beg that the report on the bill, as above set forth, be made my report on the bill under consideration.

Respectfully,

S. I. KIMBALL,
General Superintendent.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I made a favorable report on this bill by the consent of the Committee on Commerce. The bill, I will say to the Senator from Missouri, was introduced by the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and received the unanimous report of the Committee on Commerce. I presume there will be no objection to it. If there is, I will ask that the bill may go over temporarily until the junior Senator from North Carolina returns to the Chamber.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want the admirable report written by the Senator from Georgia spread upon the RECORD to justify my silence in letting the bill go through.

Mr. CLAY. Let the bill go through, Mr. President.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIANS OF THE CROW RESERVATION, MONT.

The bill (S. 2979) to ratify an agreement with the Indians of the Crow Reservation in Montana, and making appropriations to carry the same into effect, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The bill has been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments. There are no amendments in the bill but in the original agreement.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The agreement is, I think, incorporated into the bill, so that any amendments to the agreement are really amendments to the bill, if I am not mistaken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the Secretary will read the first amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, at the bottom, the lines are unnumbered—add the following paragraph:

Additional amounts may be expended for cattle from time to time at the request of the Indians under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 1, strike out "1901" and insert "1902," so as to make the additional proviso read:

Provided further, That during the year 1902 all cattle owned at that time in common by the Crow tribe of Indians shall be divided equally between said Indians, share and share alike to every man, woman, and child having rights upon the Crow Reservation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In the second line of the second paragraph on page 4 strike out "2-year-old jackasses" and insert "stallions," so as to make the paragraph read:

Fifteen thousand dollars shall be spent in the purchase of stallions, the same to be placed upon the Crow Reservation for the benefit of the Crow Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In the first line of the fifth paragraph, on page 4, before the word "thousand," strike out "Twenty-five" and insert "One hundred;" so as to make the paragraph read:

One hundred thousand dollars, or as much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended by the Secretary of the Interior in the erection, purchase, and repair of such school buildings as he may deem necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, strike out the whole of the second paragraph, in the following words:

Ten thousand dollars shall be expended under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in addition to any sum now on hand for that purpose, in the construction of two gristmills, one on Prior Creek and one on Big Horn; said mills having been provided for in the third section of the treaty [agreement] of 1890.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was read the third time.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I do not rise to oppose this bill in particular, but I wish to suggest to the Senate that it seems to me inadvisable to continue the purchase of Indian lands, paying large amounts therefor, and then to open them to homestead settlement.

This policy is a sequel of the free-homes bill, so called. If that policy is to be continued, if the Government is to extinguish all of the Indian titles to reservations not needed for allotments, paying the Indians what they may be able to agree with them for, sometimes more and sometimes less, as the Indians are willing to negotiate, it will result in paying for Indian lands in the near future a great many millions of dollars, probably $100,000,000.

I have always felt that where we open these lands by purchasing them of the Indians we ought to require people who settle upon them to pay enough money to reimburse the Government.

These lands we pay about $1.09 an acre for on an average. There are lands here which will be open to settlement that will be worth $20 and $25 an acre. It certainly would be no hardship to require settlers to reimburse the Government.

But I suppose it is useless for me to make any suggestions on this point. I merely wished to call the attention of the Senate to this policy and to the amount of money which in the near future is to be expended for this purpose.

This is only one of numerous agreements which are now pending, and I suppose that they will all pass and the Government will give to the settlers the lands for which the Indians are paid.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I simply wish to remark that the lands embraced in this treaty are very valuable, and that they are worth more than the Government is paying for them. I am not discussing what is to be done with them, but this treaty is a very proper one to be made.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Oh, certainly; if the policy is to be pursued I agree that the amount paid for these lands is not an extravagant one in view of their value.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I wish simply to remind the Senator from Connecticut and the Senate itself that what is now occurring and what the Senator has stated would occur were plainly stated by me when the first free-homes bill came up here in the Senate, and I spoke against it. It was, in my judgment, a wrong measure, and it is wrong to-day. We have no more right to take the people's money and buy Indian lands and give them to homesteaders than we would have to take that money and buy farms for citizens to make them homes.

Whenever the time comes and I can get a chance I shall vote to carry out the opposition I first made to the measure. I think it is an outrage upon the taxpayers of the United States that they should be called upon to buy land for the benefit of those who are the most fortunate in getting on the land first. You have no more right to give homesteads in such cases than you have to go and buy lands in Illinois, Ohio, or Maine and give them out to homesteaders.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

CONGRESSES OF NAVIGATION.

The bill (S. 3651) appropriating the sum of $3,000 a year for the support and maintenance of the permanent international commission of the congresses of navigation, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY D. HALL.

The bill (S. 1568) to restore Henry D. Hall to the Revenue-Cutter Service was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President to commission Henry D. Hall, late captain in the United States Revenue-Cutter Service, a captain on the permanent waiting orders list of said service, with the pay of that grade provided by law for officers on permanent waiting orders.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

PROMOTION OF COMMERCE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 1348.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1348) to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and the common defense; to promote commerce and to encourage the deep-sea fisheries.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the fact that the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] expected to speak to-day, but I understand that he does not wish to go on now, and there is no one on our side of the Chamber who desires to speak to-day. We will be ready to go on to-morrow and then continue the debate until we reach a vote. I trust that the junior Senator from Maine in charge of the bill will consent that the further consideration of the bill shall be postponed until to-morrow. I am quite sure that the debate will not consume any great length of time on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. FRYE. I certainly should not do anything that would compel the Senator from Missouri to speak, as he proposed to do, to-day. I myself can occupy a short time.

Mr. CLAY. Well, sir, that is agreeable.

Mr. FRYE. I suppose all Senators have my experience in this regard, that when they undertake to speak on any important question without manuscript they say some things they wish they had not, but they leave unsaid a great many things they wish they had said. Now, I should like to add an appendix to what I had to say yesterday.

I know some Senators on the other side in opposition to this bill will be likely to remind me that I said the bill pending in the last Congress and which we were not permitted to vote upon was as perfect a bill for its purpose as was ever drafted, and they may be surprised to find me now advocating another bill which is entirely different from the one then before the Senate. I have not changed my opinion at all. I believe now that for the purpose designed there never was a better bill than the one of the last session. I believe that it would have restored the mercantile marine more quickly to its proper position on the ocean than any other bill I have ever seen. But I was compelled to recognize the fact that among the friends of the restoration of the marine there were serious objections to some provisions of that bill.

Mr. BACON. The Senator does not think that the friends of the restoration of the marine were confined to those who favored the passage of that bill?

Mr. FRYE. I am afraid they were not all friends of the bill.

Mr. BACON. They might differ as to what would accomplish the purpose, but they were certainly all the friends of that restoration, although differing as to what would constitute the proper means.

Mr. FRYE. The conduct of Senators in opposition indicated clearly that they were in favor——

Mr. BACON. In favor of restoration? They certainly are.

Mr. FRYE. I undertook to draft a bill which should obviate the objections raised by those who were friendly to it. I think I have succeeded, for I do not know how any Senator who favors the restoration of the merchant marine by aid from the Treasury can object to any portion of the bill which is now under consideration.

I wish to correct another misunderstanding, which from the press I see is entertained by some, that fast ships, such as would be required for the carrying of United States mails, are not valuable for the carrying of farm products. As a matter of fact, under the returns of the shippers on the vessels on the American Line, each one of those ships from January, 1900, down to now, or down to six months ago, carried annually a little over $4,000,000 worth of farm products, largely in concentrated form, like canned goods, butter, cheese, lard, also hams, bacon, smoked fish, also all kinds of fresh meats, also every kind of perishable article, also fruits of every kind, until, as I said, each year each ship carried over $4,000,000 worth.

Now, take a 10-knot freight ship of 10,000 tons tonnage. Load her with wheat—12,000 tons wheat, at a value of 75 cents a bushel. She could not make more than eight voyages in a year. Allow her the same freight—12,000 tons of wheat—for each one of the eight voyages and she would carry in that year $2,888,000 in value of farm product, $1,000,000 and almost $200,000 less than any one of these fast ships carried of farm product.

There is another thing I neglected to say anything about, and that was in relation to the bounties to fisheries. Of course, every Senator understands the purpose of that bounty. It is to train and educate sailors for the Navy when we have need of sailors. I assert, without any fear of contradiction, that the fishermen of the United States have furnished a larger proportion of sailors in every war we have ever had than any other industry whatever. It is perfectly well known that General Knox made a most complimentary speech to the fishermen of Marblehead for the glorious conduct they had displayed in the war of the Revolution, and it has been true in every war, from the beginning down to now, that fishermen have been the heaviest contributors to our Navy. Germany recognizes this as a training place for sailors by the bounty. Great Britain does the same. France does the same.

As the bounty will amount to only about a couple hundred thousand dollars a year, I think that no one can seriously object to it. There have been bounties on fishermen from the beginning of the Government down to now, with the exception of a very few years before the war and with the exception of all the years since the war. The bounty was repealed at the close of the war.

Now, I desire to put in as illustrations (and I only put in a very few cases because I put them in as illustrations) what some of our consuls abroad say in relation especially to the influence of American shipping on increasing exportation.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question entirely for information?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. What is the number of sailors now engaged in this deep-sea fishing, and what is the number which the Senator anticipates under the operation of this bill?

Mr. FRYE. I can not answer intelligently either question. In the report that matter is taken up. All the fisheries are given in the report, but I have not myself looked at that portion of it since it was brought to the attention of the Senate.

In the chamber of shipping of the United Kingdom Colonel Ropner, member of Parliament and president, said:

Regarding the question of subsidies to shipping, it had become more evident that the United States would probably ere long pass a bill giving large subsidies to its shipping. The result would be a rapid extension of the United States' mercantile navy, which would come into keen competition with our own unsubsidized ships, and it would require all the watchfulness, energy and enterprise of our ship owners to maintain the proud position now occupied by our mercantile fleet.

AMERICAN TONNAGE IN HULL.

This is from our American consul at Hull in a report made to the State Department:

When we look over the figures and tables, and the returns generally, and note the large number of ships, representing millions in tonnage, that arrived at this port during 1899, it becomes a painful duty to record the arrival and departure of one little bark of 492 tons American register. Such was the Rebecca Crowell, that cleared from this port in December, 1899.

There was a time, not so far back, either, when, I am informed by old mariners here, the arrival of an American ship in Hull was regarded as a stirring event in shipping circles. These were the days of the clipper ships that proudly carried the American flag to the ports of the world. The United States in those days could boast of a merchant marine with a respectable carrying capacity of its own.

I doubt whether I could choose a more opportune moment than the present to refer to one of the lost opportunities directly chargeable to our inadequate facilities in this respect. The loss lies with the coal men of the United States. Had we been prepared to meet the demands of the markets on this side with a prompt supply of coal, I venture to say hundreds of thousands of tons would have found their way not only to continental ports but to English ports as well. I was repeatedly called on by parties interested in American coal mines for information concerning colliers, charters, etc., and the possibility of engaging carrying capacity on this coast for services at American ports.

Then here is one from Consul Strickland. He says:

I see scores of European steamers coming and going, loading and discharging almost every week, but during a residence of more than twenty years in this country I have never yet seen an American merchant steamer in African waters.

* * * * * * *

Tens of thousands of tons of goods, with which Americans could successfully compete if they had steamers of their own, are being distributed here; but in the midst of all this activity no one could tell from appearances that such a country as the United States exists.

* * * * * * *

The American-African steamship lines should be subsidized to an extent which would maintain them against competition and inevitable hostility of foreign lines, for European governments, merchants, manufacturers, and shipowners are in accord on the subject of keeping Americans away from "this richest of countries, which they hope to enjoy for ages." If the desired action is taken speedily, it may quickly change the value of United States trade with Africa from the present poor ratio of 5 per cent to 15 or 20 per cent of the whole.

Mr. CARMACK. He is consul where?

Mr. FRYE. He is consul at Gorée-Dakar, on the west coast of Africa.

Here is an extract from the report of our consul-general in Brazil:

Our import trade with Brazil can never be developed fully as long as our merchandise has to seek foreign bottoms. There ought to be a line of modern steamers between New York and the principal ports of Brazil and the River Plate. If such a line were so organized as to inspire the Rio and Santos coffee shippers with confidence in its regularity and permanency, there would be no lack of return freights. During the year 1900-1901 4,689,276 bags of coffee were sent from Rio and Santos to the United States, and during the current year the coffee export from Brazil to the United States will undoubtedly exceed 6,000,000 bags. At 35 cents per bag the freight will amount to over $2,000,000. From Para 10,000 tons of rubber were shipped to the United States last year. All this freight ought to have reached our country under the American flag. Brazil imports over 500,000 tons of coal per year. The larger part of this quantity would be furnished by the United States if we had our own steamers. The following is an alphabetical list of articles of the freights, etc.

Now, here is a report from the British consul at Marseilles:

American coal imports at Marseilles have increased very rapidly during the past three years. Rising suddenly to 118,491 tons imported during 1900, the coal imported from the United States during the first nine months of 1901 has reached the fair total of nearly 175,000 tons. It is estimated that the total import for the present year will exceed 200,000 tons. In my opinion, this American competition will only become dangerous to British coal if (1) high prices continue at home, and (2) if the American shipping interest succeeds in securing the passing of the bounty bill in 1902. In that case, I fear that the American coal owners will get the hoped-for chance of capturing the Mediterranean coal trade.

Further along the consul says:

I hold, therefore, that for the present American competition in coal is not a very serious matter. But now let us look a little further ahead and consider what must inevitably happen if Americans succeed in passing their shipping bounty bill. With 2s. 6d. per ton in their favor, and with high prices ruling at home, American competition will become a very serious matter indeed. American coals now offered at 1s. 6d. per ton below competing qualities of British are, in the opinion of Americans, quite able to stand a further reduction, if that be necessary, to meet any further fall in British prices. They do not believe that prices in Great Britain will ever come down below American output prices, but if they do the shipping bounty bill will by that time have enabled them to become masters of the situation.

With the passing of the bill the very thorough preparations that have been made for the past two years by the Baltimore and Ohio and other leading companies in the United States, with a view to ultimately monopolizing the Mediterranean coal trade, will have matured sufficiently to permit of their starting operations on a large scale. The main features of the American scheme are to reduce costs by owning their land transport and their ships; to increase the tonnage; reduce costs of manipulation by labor-saving machinery; to extend their operations all over the Mediterranean, and, via the Suez Canal, to the Philippines; to pick up return freights at every available port; to create large depots, and offer a large volume of business. The investigations have been carried out with true American foresight and thoroughness by responsible representatives of leading companies.

Mr. President, I wish to say a few words especially to the Republicans in the Senate. This bill is a logical response to the demand and the principle of the Republican party. President Arthur, in his first message to Congress, December 6, 1881, said:

The substitution of iron for wood and of steam for sail have wrought great revolutions in the carrying trade of the world; but these changes could not have been averse to America if we had given to our navigation interests a portion of the aid and protection which have been so wisely bestowed upon our manufactures. I commend the whole subject to the wisdom of Congress, with the suggestion that no question of greater magnitude or farther-reaching importance can engage their attention.

In his next annual message of December 4, 1882, he said:

The Secretary (Navy) forcibly depicts the intimate connection and interdependence of the Navy and the commercial marine, and invites attention to the continued decadence of the latter and the corresponding transfer of our growing commerce to foreign bottoms.

This subject is one of the utmost importance to the national welfare. Methods of reviving American shipbuilding and restoring the United States flag in the ocean carrying trade should receive the immediate attention of Congress. We have mechanical skill and abundant material for the manufacture of modern iron steamships in fair competition with our commercial rivals. Our disadvantage in building ships is the greater cost of labor, and in sailing them higher taxes and greater interest on capital, while the ocean highways are already monopolized by our formidable competitors. These obstacles should in some way be overcome, and for our rapid communication with foreign lands we should not continue to depend wholly upon vessels built in the yards of other countries and sailing under foreign flags. With no United States steamers on the principal ocean lines or in any foreign ports our facilities for extending our commerce are greatly restricted, while the nations which build and sail the ships and carry the mails and passengers obtain thereby conspicuous advantages in increasing their trade.

President Harrison, whom I regard as one of the ablest Presidents this country ever had—and he came from the middle West—in his message of December 3, 1889, said:

There is nothing more justly humiliating to the national pride and nothing more hurtful to the national prosperity than the inferiority of our merchant marine compared with that of other nations whose general resources, wealth, and seacoast lines do not suggest any reason for their supremacy on the sea. It was not always so, and our people are agreed, I think, that it shall not continue to be so. It is not possible in this communication to discuss the causes of the decay of our shipping interests or the differing methods by which it is proposed to restore them. The statement of a few well-authenticated facts and some general suggestions as to legislation is all that is practicable. That the great steamship lines sailing under the flags of England, France, Germany, Spain, and Italy, and engaged in foreign commerce, were promoted and have since been and now are liberally aided by grants of public money in one form or another is generally known. That the American lines of steamships have been abandoned by us to an unequal contest with the aided lines of other nations until they have been withdrawn, or in the few cases where they are still maintained are subject to serious disadvantages, is matter of common knowledge.

The present situation is such that travelers and merchandise find Liverpool often a necessary intermediate port between New York and some of the South American capitals. The fact that some of the delegates from South American States to the conference of American nations now in session at Washington reached our shores by reversing that line of travel is very conclusive of the need of such a conference and very suggestive as to the first and most necessary step in the direction of fuller and more beneficial intercourse with nations that are now our neighbors upon the lines of latitude, but not upon the lines of established commercial intercourse.

I recommend that such appropriations be made for ocean mail service in American steamships between our ports and those of Central and South America, China, Japan, and the important islands in both of the great oceans as will be liberally remunerative for the service rendered and as will encourage the establishment and in some fair degree equalize the chances of American steamship lines in the competitions which they must meet. That the American states lying south of us will cordially cooperate in establishing and maintaining such lines of steamships to their principal ports, I do not doubt.

We should also make provision for a naval reserve, to consist of such merchant ships of American construction and of a specified tonnage and speed as the owners will consent to place at the use of the Government in case of need as armed cruisers. England has adopted this policy, and as a result can now upon necessity at once place upon her naval list some of the fastest steamships in the world. A proper supervision of the construction of such vessels would make their conversion into effective ships of war very easy.

I am an advocate of economy in our national expenditures, but it is a misuse of terms to make this word describe a policy that withholds an expenditure for the purpose of extending our foreign commerce. The enlargement and improvement of our merchant marine, the development of a sufficient body of trained American seamen, the promotion of rapid and regular mail communication between the ports of other countries and our own, and the adaptation of large and swift American merchant steamships to naval uses in time of war are public purposes of the highest concern. The enlarged participation of our people in the carrying trade, the new and increased markets that will be opened for the products of our farms and factories, and the fuller and better employment of our mechanics which will result from a liberal promotion of our foreign commerce insure the widest possible diffusion of benefit to all the States and to all our people. Everything is most propitious for the present inauguration of a liberal and progressive policy upon this subject, and we should enter upon it with promptness and decision.

The legislation which I have suggested, it is sincerely believed, will promote the peace and honor of our country and the prosperity and security of the people. I invoke the diligent and serious attention of Congress to the consideration of these and such other measures as may be presented having the same great end in view.

Mr. McKinley, in his message at the commencement of the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, said:

The value of an American merchant marine to the extension of our commercial trade and the strengthening of our power upon the sea invites the immediate action of the Congress. Our national development will be one-sided and unsatisfactory so long as the remarkable growth of our inland industries remains unaccompanied by progress on the seas. There is no lack of constitutional authority for legislation which shall give to the country maritime strength commensurate with its industrial achievements and with its rank among the nations of the earth.

Last year American vessels transported a smaller share of our exports and imports than during any former year in all our history, and the measure of our dependence upon foreign shipping was painfully manifested to our people. Without any choice of our own, but from necessity, the departments of the Government charged with military and naval operations in the East and West Indies had to obtain from foreign flags merchant vessels essential for those operations.

The other great nations have not hesitated to adopt the required means to develop their shipping as a factor in national defense and as one of the surest and speediest means of obtaining for their producers a share in foreign markets. Like vigilance and effort on our part can not fail to improve our situation, which is regarded with humiliation at home and with surprise abroad. Even the seeming sacrifices, which at the beginning may be involved, will be offset later by more than equivalent gains.

The expense is as nothing compared to the advantage to be achieved. The reestablishment of our merchant marine involves in a large measure our continued industrial progress and the extension of our commercial triumphs. I am satisfied the judgment of the country favors the policy of aid to our merchant marine, which will broaden our commerce and markets and upbuild our sea-carrying capacity for the products of agriculture and manufacture; which, with the increase of our Navy, mean more work and wages to our countrymen, as well as a safeguard to American interests in every part of the world.

President McKinley also directed the attention of Congress to this subject in other of his messages, and in the last speech he ever made, the one at Buffalo on September 8, 1901, which proved to be his farewell address to the American people, he said:

Then, too, we have inadequate steamship service. New lines of steamers have already been put in commission between the Pacific coast ports of the United States and those on the western coasts of Mexico and Central and South America. These should be followed up with direct steamship lines between the eastern coast of the United States and South American ports. One of the needs of the times are direct commercial lines from our vast fields of production to the fields of consumption that we have but barely touched. Next in advantage to having the thing to sell is to have the conveyance to carry it to the buyer. We must encourage our merchant marine. We must have more ships. They must be under the American flag, built and manned and owned by Americans. These will not only be profitable in a commercial sense; they will be messengers of peace and amity wherever they go.

Then President Roosevelt, in his message to the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, said:

The condition of the American merchant marine is such as to call for immediate remedial action by the Congress. It is discreditable to us as a nation that our merchant marine should be utterly insignificant in comparison to that of other nations which we overtop in other forms of business. We should not longer submit to conditions under which only a trifling portion of our great commerce is carried in our own ships. To remedy this state of things would not merely serve to build up our shipping interests, but it would also result in benefit to all who are interested in the permanent establishment of a wider market for American products and would provide an auxiliary force for the Navy. Ships work for their own countries just as railroads work for their terminal points. Shipping lines, if established to the principal countries with which we have dealings, would be of political as well as commercial benefit. From every standpoint it is unwise for the United States to continue to rely upon the ships of competing nations for the distribution of our goods. It should be made advantageous to carry American goods in American-built ships.

At present American shipping is under certain great disadvantages when put in competition with the shipping of foreign countries. Many of the fast foreign steamships at a speed of 14 knots or above are subsidized, and all our ships—sailing vessels and steamers alike, cargo carriers of slow speed and mail carriers of high speed—have to meet the fact that the original cost of building American ships is greater than is the case abroad; that the wages paid American officers and seamen are very much higher than those paid the officers and seamen of foreign competing countries, and that the standard of living on our ships is far superior to the standard of living on the ships of our commercial rivals.

Our Government should take such action as will remedy these inequalities The American merchant marine should be restored to the ocean.

Secretaries of the Navy, Secretaries of the Treasury, and Postmasters-General in their annual reports have again and again in very earnest and strong words called attention to the necessity of the restoration of the merchant marine.

I notice that Mr. Wilson, the Secretary of Agriculture, in an interview, in which I see he afterwards said he was correctly reported, took very strong, vigorous, and earnest ground in the interest of the farmers of the United States for the restoration of the merchant marine.

Mr. President, as a matter of course I should not, if it were in my power, undertake to inconvenience in the slightest degree the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], and I am entirely willing that this bill may for the present be laid aside, unless there is some Senator who is ready to speak upon it. If there is no Senator ready to speak, the bill can be laid aside, retaining its place as the unfinished business; and I shall hope in the course of the day to-morrow to get an agreement as to the time when we shall vote on the bill. I think I shall be able to do so.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow at 2 o'clock, when the pending bill is taken up, I shall address the Senate for a short while against its passage.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I had desired to move to take up——

Mr. FRYE. I suggest that the Senator ask unanimous consent to temporarily lay aside the pending bill.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask unanimous consent that the shipping bill be temporarily laid aside, and that we take up the bill in regard to attempts against the life of the President of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, as one member of the Committee on the Judiciary, I have been endeavoring to get up for several days the bill (S. 3653) for the protection of the President of the United States, and for other purposes, but it has been suggested to me that there are a good many Senators who regard that bill as a matter of very grave interest, and that while it is not likely there will be a long debate upon it, yet there are Senators who perhaps would like to be present when the bill is considered. I do not feel under the circumstances like pressing the bill at this hour in the afternoon, but I ask that it may be made the next order of business after the disposition of the shipping bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Subject, of course, to appropriation bills.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish at this time to assent to any special order beyond the shipping bill. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] the other day to suggest that he would ask to proceed with the consideration of the bill for the protection of the President of the United States when an opportunity should occur, pending the discussion of the measure which has been under consideration. I have no objection to that, but the discussion on the pending bill may last for a week or two, and something else may intervene that may be important.

Mr. HOAR. I am told that the debate on the bill will be very brief. I do not make the request on my own motion, but perhaps out of overdeference to other Senators, certainly to one other Senator. So far as I am concerned, I should like to take up the bill now and go on with it.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator will do so.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to say, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and also in response to what has been said by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], that there is no disposition on this side of the Chamber, so far as I know, for a prolonged debate on the bill, or on the other side of the Chamber, so far as I am informed. At the same time it is a matter of very grave importance, and whatever bill is passed ought to be very carefully considered and very carefully perfected. The suggestion I took the liberty of making to the Senator from Massachusetts, and in pursuance of which he made the request this morning, was that it is a bill of such importance that it is entitled to continuous consideration, and that it ought not to be taken up at intervals in a disjointed manner and discussed in such a way as not to give it that careful and concentrated attention to which I think it is entitled.

I said further to the Senator from Massachusetts that the taking up of the bill at odd times is rather the course of proceeding when Senators are disposed to make set speeches and desire an opportunity to deliver them. We have no desire of that kind so far as I know. We ought to consider the question carefully; and I am satisfied Senators on the other side of the Chamber are impressed with an equal desire in that regard; but that it was, I thought, very much more in harmony with the dignity and importance of the bill that it should be given a place regularly upon the Calendar as the unfinished business.

I should be very glad, in view of the fact that I have been responsible in a measure for the course which the Senator from Massachusetts has this morning asked should be taken, if the Senator from Iowa would not object to the request, the Senator from Massachusetts stating that the consent agreement would be subject to the prior right of appropriation bills. I am sure the debate will not be a long one, but it ought to be a careful one; and it was with that view that I made the suggestion to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, at this moment I do not wish to mortgage, as it were, the time of the Senate beyond the consideration of the shipping bill; that is, I do not wish to participate in agreeing to such an arrangement as is proposed, while an objection will prevent it.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I am willing that later on this matter may be disposed of, but we do not know now and no one can tell now how long the bill which has been pending will be considered.

Mr. BACON. It will be a very short time, I am sure.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. When we get an adjustment about that bill, we shall determine what we will do next. Therefore, I interpose my objection for the moment. That is all.

Mr. HOAR. I hope to be able to secure an agreement to get a vote on this bill at a certain time.

Mr. BACON. I presume that probably to-morrow or next day, from what the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] said, there may be an agreement in regard to the subsidy bill.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, if we lived in the time of Methuselah——

Mr. HALE. Which we do not.

Mr. HOAR. When we had eight hundred or a thousand years of life apiece, and the population of the world for whom we had to legislate was very small, we could get along on the theory suggested by my honorable friend from Georgia [Mr. BACON]; but we can not do business in that way in the American Senate. We have, as it is, measures enough, if they were thoroughly debated and considered, to take ten years, and if every time a Senator was not ready we should postpone a measure, we should never be able to complete our business. We have to deal in one year with a vast amount of business; and we have to go on the ground that when a measure, especially a measure that has been discussed in public for a long time, has been prepared by a committee, and has been put on the Calendar, we must all of us be ready for it when it comes up; when its chance comes, the chance must be taken, or the measure gets lost. It is like Opportunity, who is said to have one lock on his forehead, and if you do not seize that lock in front, but let him go by, you can not get hold of his bald head from behind.

Now, I wish to give notice that I shall move to take up the bill for the protection of the President of the United States when the shipping bill is disposed of, and, if it is not previously disposed of, on Thursday morning, in the morning hour, I shall move to take it up immediately after the routine morning business and endeavor to get it passed before 2 o'clock, and if it is not passed before 2 o'clock I shall move that it be taken up every morning until it is passed.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President, I do not know whether this is the proper time to offer them or not, but I have some amendments that I desire to offer to the bill that has just been mentioned, the bill (S. 3653) for the protection of the President of the United States, and for other purposes, when it shall be under consideration. I ask that the amendments I now offer may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

TEXAS JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, as there seems to be nothing of importance now being considered by the Senate, or nothing more important than the bill upon which I desire action, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 11611.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 11611) to divide the State of Texas into four judicial districts.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10847) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and to submit a report thereon. I give notice that I shall call up the bill for consideration to-morrow after the routine morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. C. R. MCKENNEY, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5883) temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

The message also returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 2815) granting an increase of pension to William S. Derby.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF BILL.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business now coming before the House is the conference report on House bill 5833, known as the Philippine tariff bill. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The question having been put—

The SPEAKER. The noes appear to have it.

Mr. PAYNE. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 66, noes 65.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask for tellers.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 139, nays 110, answered "present" 16, not voting 91; as follows:

So the conference report was agreed to.

The following pairs were announced:

For the session:

Mr. MORRELL with Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WRIGHT with Mr. HALL.

Mr. BOREING with Mr. TRIMBLE.

Mr. MAHON with Mr. OTEY.

Mr. BULL with Mr. CROWLEY.

Mr. METCALF with Mr. WHEELER.

Until further notice:

Mr. KETCHAM with Mr. SNODGRASS.

Mr. GROSVENOR with Mr. SNOOK.

Mr. CRUMPACKER with Mr. JONES of Virginia.

Mr. PRINCE with Mr. GRIFFITH.

Mr. DEEMER with Mr. POLK.

Mr. BURTON with Mr. SPARKMAN.

Mr. HULL with Mr. COONEY.

Mr. BROWNLOW with Mr. PIERCE.

Mr. SOUTHWICK with Mr. SULZER.

Mr. BURKETT with Mr. SHALLENBERGER.

Mr. EDDY with Mr. SHEPPARD.

Mr. HANBURY with Mr. WOOTEN.

For this day:

Mr. OTJEN with Mr. NEVILLE.

Mr. MILLER with Mr. RYAN.

Mr. APLIN with Mr. SCARBOROUGH.

Mr. STEWART of New York with Mr. TALBERT.

Mr. MARTIN with Mr. MAHONEY.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH with Mr. GAINES of Tennessee.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois with Mr. LAMB.

Mr. MCCLEARY with Mr. EDWARDS.

Mr. JACKSON of Maryland with Mr. VANDIVER.

Mr. HOPKINS with Mr. MCANDREWS.

Mr. BLACKBURN with Mr. FLOOD.

Mr. GILL with Mr. GLENN.

Mr. WADSWORTH with Mr. COCHRAN.

Mr. MCLACHLAN with Mr. MCDERMOTT.

Mr. VREELAND with Mr. BUTLER of Missouri.

Mr. DOVENER with Mr. NEWLANDS.

Mr. DICK with Mr. SPIGHT.

Mr. IRWIN with Mr. GOOCH.

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. BENTON.

Mr. GIBSON with Mr. GOLDFOGLE.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey with Mr. BELLAMY.

Mr. EMERSON with Mr. BREAZEALE.

Mr. GRAHAM with Mr. DOUGHERTY.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER with Mr. MICKEY.

Mr. SCHIRM with Mr. REID.

Mr. BINGHAM with Mr. STEPHENS of Texas.

Mr. KNAPP with Mr. ROBINSON of Nebraska.

Mr. FOWLER with Mr. HENRY of Mississippi.

Mr. SHERMAN with Mr. BELMONT.

Mr. BABCOCK with Mr. SWANSON.

On this vote:

Mr. HAUGEN with Mr. NORTON.

Mr. MANN with Mr. JETT.

Mr. GROW with Mr. BARTLETT.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Speaker, I am informed that Mr. YOUNG of Pennsylvania, with whom I am paired, is not here. Therefore I desire to withdraw my vote and be recorded "present."

Mr. SWANSON. I have voted "no;" but I find I am paired with the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. BABCOCK, who is at home ill. If he were present, he would vote "aye" and I should vote "no."

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to withdraw my vote and be marked "present," as I am paired with the gentleman from California, Mr. METCALF.

Mr. GOOCH. I find I am paired with my colleague, Mr. IRWIN, and therefore desire to withdraw my vote and be marked "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. PAYNE moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence indefinitely, on account of important business.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up for consideration the report of the conferees on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses on the pension appropriation bill. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the report be dispensed with, and that the statement of the House conferees be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BARNEY]? The Chair hears none. [A pause.] The statement of the House conferees does not appear to be at the desk with the report.

Mr. BARNEY. Both papers were on the Speaker's table yesterday. I ask, then, that the report be read, and the reading of the statement be dispensed with.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is there no statement accompanying the report of the conferees?

The SPEAKER. The statement can not be found at present. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent—it can only be done in that way—to read the report instead of the statement.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I insist that the statement should be on hand and on file, Mr. Speaker. The rules require the statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Wisconsin that he withdraw his report until the statement can be found. It was on the desk last night.

Mr. BARNEY. Very well. I shall do so.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 11728.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts in the chair, and resumed the further consideration of House bill 11728.

RURAL FREE-DELIVERY SERVICE.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know how much time has been consumed, pro and con, in the debate on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Two hours and twenty-five minutes on behalf of the majority of the committee and one hour and thirty minutes on behalf of the minority.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS].

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I am loath to oppose a report brought before the House by so large a majority of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, but I feel that I can not subscribe to that report and to any degree whatever represent the people who honored me with a seat in this House. We are told that all but two members of that committee signed the majority report. I believe the chairman of the committee himself will confess that the chief activity, however, in behalf of the majority report has come from the chairman of the committee.

I was somewhat impressed with the statement made by the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] as to the labor that the committee had put upon this question, the worry this subject had given them, how they had considered it during the day and far into the night, and it occurred to me that after all that attention, all that worry, all that trouble, all that labor, a committee composed of 17 members ought to have been able to bring forth a better child than this—a child that belongs to a family—the contract family—that has brought more shame and more discredit upon this nation than all of the other national families combined.

Contract service! I never hear that word "contract" mentioned in this connection that I do not think of convict-contract labor, but to the credit of convict-contract labor be it said that that is let to the highest bidder. This is let to the lowest bidder. Cheap! cheap! I insist that the brand of cheapness be not placed upon this promising service. Almost a unanimous report, and with nothing more promising than this! I fear the members of the committee—courteous, graceful, accommodating gentlemen—have fallen victims to the genial smile and sunny disposition of my friend from California. [Laughter.] I am afraid he has hypnotized the members of that committee.

I do know, Mr. Chairman, that there is no excuse for this bill; I do know, Mr. Chairman, that there is no demand for this bill. This service was instituted a little over four years ago. To-day, I am told, there are well on to 10,000 rural free-delivery carriers in this nation, and I believe that no service—no experimental service—ever instituted by this Government has so completely vindicated the judgment and the expectations of its sponsors. No service ever instituted has spoken so eloquently for itself.

To-day it is nominally still an experimental service, but every member of this House knows that to-day it is an absolute fixture; every member of this House knows that to-day it is an absolute fact. And, more than that, we all know that millions of people this day in this Republic are extending their hands to this House beseeching us to give them the blessings of this service; but just now, after this service has vindicated its right to life, this proposition, looking to a complete revolution of the service, is brought in here. I say a complete revolution of the service, because the carriers make up the service, and if you revolutionize the methods of selecting these carriers, of paying these carriers, and controlling these carriers, you revolutionize this service. There is no excuse whatever for this bill. The service has been a success from the hour the experiment was begun. It has gone on winning friends by leaps and bounds, and I believe to-day has a warmer place in the affections of those it comes in contact with than any other service in the Government.

I do not believe that there is any demand for this bill. I do not believe that there is a single member of the Post-Office Committee who has received a single letter from a single constituent asking for the passage of this bill. I do not believe there is a member of this House who has received a letter from a single constituent asking for the passage of this bill.

I believe that this child was born in the mind and in the imagination of the distinguished gentleman from California, and I believe that the support he received from the members of that committee was simply a perfunctory support—simply a nominal support; and I feel satisfied in my own mind that if the matter were dropped this very hour no tears would be shed by any other member of that committee than the gentleman himself.

There is no excuse for the bill, no demand for the bill, but there are reasons for the bill.

The first reason is that the members of the committee—most conspicuously the gentleman from California—are afraid that these carriers will organize and overawe Congress. Poor Congress! They are about to overawe and intimidate the members of this body. My friend from California [Mr. LOUD] bore down very heavily on that proposition, and after he had hammered it into the members of this House with all the force and energy of his nature he undid it all by giving a little incident that had come under his own observation in his own district. He stated that a city carrier who had been delivering mail in his Congressional district, because the distinguished gentleman from California had not interested himself in securing him an increase of salary, had gone along that route and worked up a feeling against him.

So far, so good; but the gentleman went on and stated that he complained to the Department, and the Department came in and served notice on that carrier that if it heard of any further continuance of that work, he would be discharged; and the sequel to it all was that a few weeks later this carrier came to the gentleman's office and on his knees begged him to see that he was not discharged.

Mr. LOUD. I know the gentleman wants to be fair, but he misstates the case. Evidently he did not hear or read what I said.

Mr. LANDIS. I always want to be fair.

Mr. LOUD. I made no complaint to the Department; neither did I say or intimate anything of the kind.

Mr. LANDIS. The Department took it up, did it not?

Mr. LOUD. The Department took it up months before, on their own responsibility.

Mr. LANDIS. How did the Department know it?

Mr. LOUD. Know what?

Mr. LANDIS. Know that this carrier had made these threats?

Mr. LOUD. Why, it was not this particular case that they were looking out for, but they had men all over the country——

Mr. LANDIS. They had men all over the country looking for members of Congress who were about to be intimidated! [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. No; looking after the carriers, and they have them now.

Mr. LANDIS. And they could have them under this rural free-delivery carrier system.

Mr. LOUD. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. LANDIS. And they would protect members of Congress in the same way, would they not?

Mr. LOUD. Well, I do not think they have ever protected the gentleman who is on the floor at present.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. He has not needed any protection.

Mr. LANDIS. I have not needed any protection.

Mr. LOUD. No; because you have always been ready to obey whatever they require.

Mr. LANDIS. No; but I will say to the gentleman from California that I have opposed the proposition to place the carrier in Indiana in my district on the same plane as to wages as the gentleman from California places the Chinaman who works in California. [Applause.] Chinese labor in California is rated at $1 a day.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman had better confine himself to Indiana.

Mr. LANDIS. My distinguished friend from California would put the carrier's wages at $1 a day. I will not subscribe to that.

Mr. THAYER. They do not get a dollar a day with us.

Mr. LANDIS. They would not get a dollar a day under the $300 per annum proposition. They would get less than a dollar a day, and furnish a wagon and two horses and board themselves and furnish their own smoking tobacco. [Laughter.] I say that when the gentleman related that little incident he answered the objection by reciting that the Department served notice on that carrier that they would remove him if he continued that practice, and a few weeks later, on his bended knee, he appealed to the gentleman from California to save his position for him.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman's statement, of course, is metaphorical.

Mr. LANDIS. And true to his large heart and generous instincts, the gentleman from California saved the carrier.

Mr. LOUD. Of course, the gentleman means that he was on his bended knee, metaphorically.

Mr. LANDIS. Metaphorically speaking.

Mr. LOUD. You were not present, of course.

Mr. LANDIS. If my friend from California will pursue that subject, he will probably remember the fact that for fifteen years the city carriers have been attempting to have their salaries raised to $1,200 per annum, and year after year they have sent in their petitions. I presume they have sent their threats to some members of this House; but their salaries have not been increased. My distinguished friend from California knows that there has been a concerted move on the part of the railway mail clerks of this Republic during the last five or six years to have a reclassification bill pass this House.

They have bombarded us with letters; they have sent delegates to us to see us at our homes. Up to a few weeks ago this continuous, concerted pressure had reached such a point as to alarm members of this House; piled up their mail so that some of them had to employ special secretaries. A notice came from the White House to these gentlemen informing them that if any one of them attempted to bring influence to bear looking toward the enactment of any special legislation in which they were interested they would lose their positions, and since that order was issued I doubt whether a member of this House has received a letter from any member of that organization.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman cares to examine that, the committee has some petitions and letters.

Mr. LANDIS. They were sent before the order was issued.

Mr. LOUD. They came to us a few days ago.

Mr. LANDIS. You probably did not see them before.

Mr. LOUD. I do see practically everything that comes to that committee.

Mr. LANDIS. I have not received any. I received hundreds of them before the order was issued. An order like that would operate in the same way with the rural free-delivery carriers if there were any necessity for it. My friend from California——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LANDIS. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does my friend from Indiana think the President or anybody else in this country should shut off the people of this country from writing to their public servants or bar them of the ancient right to petition?

Mr. LANDIS. That has nothing to do with this question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think it has.

Mr. LANDIS. Not at all. If my friend will bring in something relevant, I will give it due consideration.

I will say this, Mr. Chairman, that I feel that if any considerable number of employees in any particular branch of this Government establishes an organization to bring influence to bear upon this Congress to increase their salaries, it is proper that the President should give them notice that it would be cause for removal. [Applause.] And I would say this, while speaking on this organization of the railway mail clerks, that I feel the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads could with a good deal better grace have given attention to the prayers and petitions that they have received from those people than to go out of the way and try to revolutionize a system to which there is now no objection.

I believe the railway mail clerks have justice on their side. I believe that they have grievances that this Congress should give attention. I believe that there are inequalities in the salaries of railway mail clerks that Congress should correct. I do not believe that there is any class of men in this country who are doing as much work for as little pay as the railway mail clerks. And the same thing is true of clerks in post-offices.

My friend from California spoke with some emphasis of the part that he had played in instituting this service originally. He stated that he was largely responsible for it. He intimated that he would be willing to blush and plead guilty if anyone should say he was its "papa!" [Laughter.] He said that he had agreed to christen the child on the basis that it would require no more than $300 a year for its support.

Three hundred dollars a year for a free rural-delivery carrier, covering a route 25 miles in length, furnishing his own horse—two of them, generally—furnishing his own wagon. Three hundred dollars a year! With no legal holiday; no annual leave; no sick leave. Three hundred days of continuous service, furnishing two horses and a wagon, for $300; and yet the gentleman from California brings in a bill each year providing for the payment of $240 for the mail carrier who drives a cart in the small city.

Mr. LOUD. The Post-Office Committee do not bring in anything of the kind, neither have the Post-Office Committee fixed the salary of the rural carriers.

Mr. LANDIS. The gentleman has never in any way called attention of Congress to the allowance made to the cart man in the small town, claiming it to be exorbitant.

Mr. LOUD. The Post-Office Committee, permit me to say, brings in a lump sum for carrying the mail for the Post-Office Department, and they have no knowledge of what is paid.

Mr. LANDIS. The Post-Office Committee certainly has some sort of jurisdiction.

Mr. LOUD. None whatever.

Mr. LANDIS. Well, you ought to have

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman is getting into deep water when he gets into post-office matters. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANDIS. The gentleman from California, who has given such specific attention to the workings of the Post-Office Department, ought to give some attention to these other matters and be consistent. The great committee over which the gentleman presides has sanctioned the allowance of $240 for a cart and horse in a small city and yet insists that $300 a year is enough for the salary of the rural free-delivery carrier who furnishes two horses and a cart.

Mr. LOUD. That may be ingenuous, but it is not the fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. SWANSON. I yield the gentleman fifteen minutes more.

Mr. LANDIS. I do not want it understood that I think the allowance made the city carrier is too much. It is not too much; but I can not understand how the gentleman from California can reconcile his generous treatment of the city carrier with his proposed niggardly treatment of the rural carrier. He sanctions a salary of $850 for the city carrier and in addition an allowance of $240 for horse and cart. At the same time he insists that the rural carrier furnish two horses and a wagon and perform carrier service on a route 25 miles in length all for $300.

Mr. LOUD. What horse and cart is the gentleman referring to?

Mr. LANDIS. To the horse and cart for a carrier in a town like Kokomo, Ind. The carrier gets a salary of $850 and an allowance of $240 for cart and horse.

Mr. LOUD. The Government furnishes him with a horse and cart?

Mr. LANDIS. The Government allows him $240 for the horse and cart.

Mr. LOUD. They may make the allowance or they may furnish it to him.

Mr. LANDIS. Why would not it be right for the Government to furnish the rural free-delivery carrier with a horse and cart or its equivalent, $240, besides the salary?

Mr. LOUD. Perhaps it would.

Mr. LANDIS. But not with the sanction of the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman from Indiana is mistaken.

Mr. LANDIS. Well, the gentleman from California started out on a basis of $300 a year for a rural free-delivery carrier.

Mr. LOUD. Permit me to say that neither the gentleman from California, nor the Post-Office Committee, nor the House of Representatives have ever up to the present moment had anything to do with fixing the salary of the rural free-delivery carrier.

Mr. LANDIS. I know; but you would only allow such a small appropriation that the Department could not pay more.

Mr. LOUD. We have given them all they asked for and more, too.

Mr. LANDIS. There is not a member on the floor of the House when this proposed appropriation was up that did not receive the impression that the proposed appropriation did not receive the enthusiastic indorsement of the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. What does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. LANDIS. I am referring to the appropriations made for free-delivery service.

Mr. LOUD. When?

Mr. LANDIS. On former occasions when the Post-Office bill was up before the House.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman is mistaken, and I defy him to find a word or a remark of mine showing that I was opposed to any appropriation.

Mr. LANDIS. I think the gentleman gave that impression from what he stated yesterday.

Mr. LOUD. Had not the gentleman from Indiana better rely on the RECORD instead of on his memory?

Mr. LANDIS. No; on the proposed increase last month the gentleman from California opposed it.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman from California did not oppose what the Department asked for. The Post-Office Committee has given all that the Department has asked for.

Mr. LANDIS. With all due consideration for the gentleman from California, I will say that his manner in handling this question on the floor of the House has not left any other impression on the minds of the members than that he was not heartily in sympathy with this service. I do not think any better evidence of that need be produced than the statements made yesterday to the effect that if this service could be carried on as originally proprosed, on the basis of $300, it would have been all right.

But it is not a $300 service. It is not a cheap service, it is not a niggardly service; or it will not be when Congress gets through with this bill. It will not be a cheap service. The members of this House will insist that the boy from the country who carries this mail over a stretch of 25 miles, furnishing two horses and a wagon, is at least equal to the boy in the town who drives a cart over about one-third of the distance and does not work any longer.

Mr. LOUD. Then he ought to have $1,100, the gentleman says?

Mr. LANDIS. No; I don't think so, but I will tell the gentleman what I would give him.

Mr. LOUD. If he is worth as much or more, he ought to be paid as much.

Mr. LANDIS. He is worth as much.

Mr. LOUD. How much does your man get that you have alluded to?

Mr. LANDIS. Eight hundred and forty dollars plus $240.

Mr. LOUD. How much is that? [Laughter.]

Mr. LANDIS. Almost $1,100.

Mr. LOUD. Well, you say these men are worth as much or more; why should not they have it?

Mr. LANDIS. I would give it to them, I think.

Mr. LOUD. Then the gentleman is in favor of $1,100?

Mr. LANDIS. I would pay the carriers from $600 to $1,100, according to the routes over which they carry. And I do not think that a competent superintendent or a competent inspector or a competent agent would have any difficulty in deciding about what the salary should be. They do not seem to have any difficulty in deciding that question now in the cities. Some of these carriers receive as low salaries as $300 a year.

Mr. LOUD. The law fixes the salaries paid in the cities. I do not suppose the gentleman is aware that the Department has no discretion whatever in that matter.

Mr. LANDIS. A law could be passed that would enable the Postmaster-General to fix these salaries.

Mr. LOUD. But with the city carrier the law fixes the salary.

Mr. LANDIS. And the law could fix the salary of the rural free-delivery carrier.

Mr. LOUD. Of course.

Mr. LANDIS. And we make the law.

Mr. LOUD. But the gentleman is making a comparison, and saying that we could do so and so in the cities. I say we can not.

Mr. LANDIS. We could change the law if we wanted to. A law once passed can be changed.

Mr. LOUD. You can not change it.

Mr. LANDIS. Congress can.

Mr. LOUD. Would you advocate the change?

Mr. LANDIS. I would want the question fully presented, and then I would, in my wisdom and discretion, decide it.

Mr. LOUD. You know so much about the matter that you ought to be able to decide it now.

Mr. LANDIS. If, after laboring, as the gentleman from California has done, for months, I did not know anything more about this proposition than he seems to know, I would——

Mr. LOUD. "The gentleman from California" evidently knows what he wants and the "gentleman from Indiana" does not.

Mr. LANDIS. I do not think "the gentleman from California" knows what he wants. He knows what the people want, and true to his instinct he is against what they want.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. You say you are in favor of paying these "boys" $1,100 a year?

Mr. LANDIS. I am, if they earn it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Now, I want to ask you whether you do not know that such a salary would be in excess of the annual income of the farmers to whom this mail is carried and who in the last extremity must pay these taxes for both the city carrier and the country carrier?

Mr. LANDIS. I do not know what the annual income of the farmers is in your district; but the annual income of a large number of farmers in my district who receive their mail by the rural free delivery exceeds $1,100 a year.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. More of them receive an annual income below that sum than above it.

Mr. LANDIS. That may be true, but I say I would pay these carriers exactly what they earn—no more and no less.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. And you would saddle the expense upon the farmer, as you always do, and then talk about the "boy" in the country.

Mr. LANDIS. I would not saddle it upon the farmer at all. The cost of this service is paid out of the National Treasury. Let me ask the gentleman from Missouri whether he has heard of any farmer complaining——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. LANDIS. Because of excessive compensation paid these carriers?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I have heard the farmers complain all the time that the expense of this and all other services is taxed upon them; that the tax eaters are getting more than their share, while the taxpayers are getting less and less.

Mr. LANDIS. I did not grant permission for the gentleman to inject his campaign speech into my remarks.

I shall insist, Mr. Chairman, that the rural free-delivery carrier who furnishes two horses and a cart, who boards the horses and looks after the repair of the cart, is entitled to just as good a salary as the carrier who delivers the mail in the cities; I shall insist that Congress should legislate so that this salary shall be fixed in accordance with the service rendered, and I insist that the people who are the beneficiaries of this service will be satisfied with nothing less. This service is a farmers' service, and the farmers are satisfied with it as it is. The only complaint they make is that it is not extended with sufficient rapidity. They do not want it changed to a contract service. They do not think there is extravagance in this service. I have heard complaints from the country as to the extravagant prices paid for carrying the mails on the railroads.

Big prices are paid for that service, and the gentleman from California seems glad; at least, I have heard no objection from him. Big prices are paid to the steamboats for mail transportation, and the gentleman seems glad; at least, I have heard no objection from him. Big prices have been paid for years to the original star-route contractors; and I have heard no objection from the distinguished gentleman from California. Members of that committee also seem to be glad (at least, they take no exceptions) on account of the niggardly pay given to the men who actually carry the star-route mail and the men who carry letters along the rural free-delivery routes. The subcontractor on the star route and the man who carries the rural route seem to have no place in the affections of this Post-Office Committee.

I remember, three years ago, going from a little town in my district to a place 15 miles distant. I rode with an old soldier who carried the star route. He carried it every day, and he told me that his compensation was $90 a year. He furnished his own horse, he furnished his own wagon, he fed his horse, and he looked after the repairs of the wagon, and the original contractor, I was told afterwards, received $400 for the carrying of that route. I would like to see the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to-day come to the rescue of these men rather than propose a revolution of this service to which no one is taking any exceptions.

Mr. COWHERD. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that we have already rescued those men.

Mr. LANDIS. I heard that some time ago, and yet my friend from Bridgeport tells me that a route was let just a short time ago out of the town in which he lives, where this rescue was not in evidence.

Mr. COWHERD. I will state that it is the purpose of the Department to provide that the carrier must live along the route.

Mr. LANDIS. Yes, the carrier must live along the route, but I insist that some other person who lives along the route—the fellow who has a few thousand dollars, who has made it possibly taking chattel mortgages on horses and cows belonging to poor families—he lives along the route, too, and he will bid in this route, and then he will sublet it to some poor devil who can eke out a miserable existence carrying the route. Living along the route does not solve this problem. In order to solve it the provision must be that the man who bids in the route must not only live along the route but carry the route. This evil in star-route contracts has not been corrected.

Mr. Chairman, I have possibly spoken longer than I should on this question, and disconnectedly, because of the interruptions of the gentleman from California [laughter], but I feel that the House would make a great mistake in revolutionizing this service. As far as I am individually concerned, I would prefer to see this service abolished altogether. I do not want the brand of cheapness placed upon it. Put it up to the lowest bidder, and the lowest bidder will get it, and that will mean a cheap service, and a cheap service will soon breed complaints, and the complaints will come to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads will at the proper time dump those complaints in on this House and say that this system is not feasible and that it ought to be abolished.

I do not believe in discrediting this system in that way. It is going now as we want it to go—we friends of the service—and it is making friends every day. The farmer is happy when he learns that he is to have the service. I have heard no good reason, and I know there is no demand, for a change in the service. I think the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] touched the right spot yesterday when he stated that if for no other reason this service should be continued because it would tend to popularize country life.

The tendency now is from the country to the city. The boys are leaving the farm. They are leaving the farm, and why? Because it is lonesome on the farm, because it is monotonous on the farm, and they are going to the city where it is true a great many of them reach ultimately positions of distinction and a great many of them become hewers of wood and drawers of water. I would give the farmer a daily mail at his door. I would make it possible for every farmer to receive a daily paper throughout the length and breadth of this Republic, if such a thing were practicable. Let him receive the magazines just as soon as they are received in the town; make it possible for him to keep in touch with the daily market just as the man does in the town.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like just a few moments more.

Mr. SWANSON. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. LANDIS. I would do this, Mr. Chairman, in order to check this tendency from the country to the city, and I would do it notwithstanding the fact that it costs money. Of course it costs money. I want it to cost money. I do not know of anything that is good that we get in this Republic that does not cost money.

Of course, there are complaints when we spend money. We hear complaints when the proposition is made to improve the rivers and harbors; but it comes from those who do not seem to appreciate that our commerce in this Republic has developed almost miraculously. We hear these same complaints when a great appropriation comes in here providing for millions for public buildings—complaints made by "little Americans," who do not seem to appreciate the fact that vast stretches of country which fifty years ago were desolate and waste have become peopled by millions of Americans, whose hope and ambition has blossomed into cities, and that Columbia pays a premium in the shape of a public building.

We heard complaints made here just after the blowing up of the Maine in opposition to a war with Spain because it would cost money and because it would increase the pension roll. We had that war, it did cost money, and it will possibly increase the pension roll; but this country vindicated its honor, this nation vindicated its right to live among the family of nations, and by that war this nation was elevated to a position from which a year ago our President dictated terms to the monarchies of the world.

Cost! Of course this service will cost. Everything you have in this Republic that is worth having costs. I want this rural route service to cost more each year, because then I will know that it is increasing, and scattering its blessings over a wider area. But I want nothing cheap about it. I do not want the word "contract" associated with it.

I do not know how long I will belong to this House, but as long as I am here and see this appropriation brought in for rural free delivery, every time I hear the item read, I will think of the American farmer sitting in his own home, in front of his own hearthstone in the evening, dividing with his wife and children the joys and comforts that come from a daily mail, the greatest blessing the American home can have from the American Government. [Applause.]

Mr. SWANSON. I yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX].

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, in the first place I desire to say that I have the utmost confidence in the chairman of this Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and in the members of that committee. I have the greatest respect for the independence of the chairman of that committee, and especially have I the greatest respect for my colleague from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] who is on that committee. It was with the utmost reluctance that on this occasion I have found myself compelled to differ with their conclusions. Ordinarily we are necessarily controlled by the reports of the committees on these bills that are brought before the House for our consideration, but on this question that is before us to-day it seems to me that every member of Congress ought to be as well posted as the committee.

Now, I may confess that when this question was first suggested I was heartily in favor of some reformation along this line; but after mature deliberation on this subject, I have come to the conclusion that we have commenced our reform at the wrong place. If there are any people in this country more than others who ought to receive our consideration, they are the people who live in the rural districts. They have submitted to all sorts of taxation. They have submitted to all sorts of hardships, uncomplaining at all times. They have no lobby here to represent them in this Capitol. They have no paid attorney to represent their interests here, but they must rely upon their Representatives in this Congress to do them justice.

Now, as I say, after I carefully considered this matter, with my prejudices, I may say, all in the other direction, I was forced after deliberate conclusion that if we pass this bill we do a wrong to the people who reside in the rural districts of the United States. If we want to begin reform, gentlemen, there are other places where we can begin with a great deal more credit to ourselves and to the country. Some of these I want to call to your attention this morning.

I want, in the first place, to begin with the origin of the rural free-delivery service. It began by appropriating $10,000 in 1894, in the Fifty-third Congress—a Democratic Congress. In 1895, $10,000 was appropriated; in 1896, $10,000; in 1897, $40,000; in 1898, $150,000; in 1899, $450,000; in 1900, $1,750,000, and in 1901, in the last Congress, $3,500,000 was appropriated for this service.

Now, let me call your attention to another fact. As I say, if it is our purpose to begin a reform in this service, I propose to point out to this assembly to-day that there is another body that we can reach with more force and more reason than these people whom you expect to reach by this bill. Now, listen to this: There are 17,789 carriers in the city free-delivery service, at a cost of $16,140,450, with additional expenses which carries the amount to $18,745,450.

Now, mark you, we have appropriated $3,500,000 for the rural carrier service. For city delivery alone we have appropriated $18,750,000, which amount is necessary for the purpose of delivering the mail to the people who liye in cities.

Now, my friends, let me call your attention to another fact. I want to say that it takes a better man in every respect to make a successful rural carrier than it does to make a successful city carrier. A city carrier simply delivers the mail that is given to him on his route, or he goes to the boxes and takes up that mail and turns it in at the post-office.

A rural carrier not only delivers the mail along his route, but he is required to sell postage stamps, to register letters, to sell post-office orders, and, in fact, everything that the postmaster does himself. So it requires a better class of men to fill the position of rural carrier than it does the position of city carrier.

Now, what is required of a city carrier? Of course, every man who applies for the position of a carrier in a city has to undergo an examination at the post-office by a set of men who are authorized to make this examination. So far as my experience goes, there are at least 20 men who stand examinations for every position that is to be filled. Now, why should not the Post-Office Committee come in and say that the position of city carriers should be submitted to contract? Here are 20 eligible men, who have proven themselves to be perfectly eligible by examination. They are competent to carry the mails through the city. Why not say to these 20? "We will give it to the man who will take it for the least money." They are equal in every respect, morally, physically, socially, and otherwise, except, perhaps, there is a difference in the marks made in their examination.

Now, I present for your consideration this fact. There are 17,000 of them, at a cost of over $18,000,000 to this Government, and yet there are 10 men who have qualified themselves for the position where there is one position to let. Is it not just as feasible, just as reasonable, that these men should bid for this work—these 10, these 20, these 25, who make themselves eligible as city carriers—and submit their bids and say that "we will take this position for $500 instead of $800?"

But gentlemen have said the difficulty about rural routes is that some men carry a route of 18 miles, some a route of 10 miles, some a route of 20 miles, and some carry one of 25 miles, and that we can not regulate this matter. Let me call your attention to the report of the Postmaster-General in regard to the city delivery. This is the very latest report from the Postmaster-General. My idea is to present to the House how they regulate the carriers in the city delivery, and to impress upon you, if I can, why it is they may not just as well regulate the salary of the carrier of the rural delivery on the same basis. Now listen to this. Fourteen hundred carriers receive for their services $600 for city delivery, 707 carriers $800, 6,317 carriers $850, 9,365 carriers $1,000.

Now, gentlemen, does it not occur to you that they grade these carriers in this Department according to the service they render? Is it impossible for the Post-Office Committee to frame a bill by which these routes can be graded? In other words, where a man carries a route 14 miles, or 25 miles, or 20 miles his case may be regulated somewhat in the same manner and in the same form as the salary of city carriers.

Now, I want to call attention further to this matter. There are other people who are interested in the postal service. I have called your attention to 17,000 city carriers in this country who are delivering mail at salaries, ranging from $600 up to $1,000 a year.

Now, listen to this: There are 9,182 postal clerks employed under the Government. They cost the Government $7,675,436.72. How are these people appointed? They are required to pass an examination—which is proper. No gentleman will deny that, considering the importance of their service; and yet at the same time there are ten men for every position open for appointment who are eligible and make themselves eligible by examination for appointment that the Government has to give. Why does not the Government let these places by contract? Is it not just as easy and reasonable?

But it is said by the chairman of this committee that we can not arrange this matter, because some routes are longer than others; some men deserve more than others. Let us see how the Post-Office Department manages this postal service; I have told you about the city carriers. There are 1,292 clerks of Class A at $1,400; there are 1,824 at $1,200; 4,255 at $1,000; 2,358 not exceeding (the law says) $900; there are 680 of these clerks that do not exceed $800. Have they not found a way to regulate the service of these gentlemen on the railroads?

Now, let us take this into consideration. It is a plain business proposition, gentlemen. Take the railway mail clerks. They are examined by a civil-service board; they are required to come up to a certain percentage. I say now, and I believe it can not be successfully contradicted, that for every place we have to give in the railway-postal service, of the men who handle the mails in this country, that there are at least ten men who make themselves eligible for every position in that service. Now, is it not just as reasonable that we shall advertise this work, and say to these men, "Which one of you will take this for the least amount of money?"

Is not the same proposition applicable to the city delivery? When we examine these clerks or carriers for city delivery, in many instances there are 25 applicants for every vacancy existing. Why not say to them, "you shall be employed by contract, which one of you will carry this mail for the least amount?" But, my friends, that is not the idea; that is not the object of the Government, and it ought not to be. Under the civil service in this country, if it is properly and honestly administered, the idea is to give it to the men who are best qualified to fill these positions.

Then, I ask, in the name of God, why should we draw the line when it comes to serving our country constituency, the very mudsill of this great Republic of ours? Must we say to the people who live in our rural districts, "You are to be served by contract and by inferior men, and will take it for the least sum, and all the requirement that is necessary to deliver the mail is that you can read and write, that you have got a good moral character, and if you do not want to carry the contract longer than thirty days you can throw it up?"

Now, my friends, that is all wrong; that will not do. Let me tell you something. Of all the people on God Almighty's earth that ought to receive the consideration of this Congress of the United States it is those people who live in the rural districts of this country. They have submitted to all sorts of exaction, all sorts of taxation, and there is no man in the hearing of my voice who does not know that in the hour of trouble in this country they are our safeguard and our support and the great conservative element in this country at all times and on all occasions. [Applause.]

Then, why should we begin this question of reform upon the people who have never received anything at the hands of the United States Congress, when we could more appropriately begin elsewhere?

Now, I want to say that I do not believe I have been fairly treated by the people at the Post-Office Department. I believe in a large measure, before the civil service was applied, that they had been using this service to advance political purposes; but is the Department to blame? Is it not the fault of the members of this House? But I do not believe it can be done now. I believe that when the President of the United States put this service under the civil-service law he meant what he said, and he will see that the law is enforced; and that is an answer to all the questions that have been submitted by the other gentlemen who have spoken upon this measure in relation to this service being used for political purposes.

Mr. FLEMING. I wish to say to the gentleman right here, if he will allow me, for his own gratification, that I am authorized by the chairman of the Civil Service Commission to say that the case cited by the gentleman from Kentucky yesterday, where five Republicans and no Democrats were put into the department in Kentucky, that it was done before the 1st of February, when this order went into effect.

Mr. BURLESON. Now, if the gentleman from Georgia will permit me, right on that point, I have a letter here from the superintendent of the rural delivery service in relation to the appointments which it was said yesterday were made contrary to the civil-service law in the Seventh Congressional district in Kentucky. I will read from it:

The cases referred to are the routes established at Georgetown, Scott County, Ky., on March 1, this year. The investigation by the special agent was made early in December, his report being dated December 12, 1901. You understand that the civil-service rules went into effect on February 1, 1902. At the time the Georgetown, Ky., investigations were made the civil-service rules were not in effect and the selections were made under the practice in vogue before February 1. No examination whatever was held, either civil service or otherwise. The selections were left entirely to the judgment and discretion of the special agent who was on the ground.

After the special agent had made his report, the Representative from that district submitted a letter to this office requesting that all of the appointees suggested by the special agent be dropped from the service and certain persons whom he suggested be appointed. It was explained to him personally that the men named by the agent were bonded at the time of the investigation and were selected in good faith and that the Department could not see its way clear to disapprove the recommendation of the special agent unless he (the Representative) could show that the nominees were not fit to perform service or were men of bad character.

In reply to your further inquiry, I have to say that since the inauguration of the civil-service rules, February 1, no appointment either to fill vacancy or for original service has been made not in strict accordance with the rules. It is true that many carriers who were selected and bonded in December, some as far back as November, will not begin operations until March, some as late as April. All men selected prior to February 1 and sworn in before that date are entitled to appointment.

Very respectfully,

A. W. MACHEN,
General Superintendent.

That is a complete answer to the charges made here yesterday with reference to the Kentucky cases.

Mr. MADDOX. That only emphasizes, Mr. Chairman, what I said before.

Mr. LANDIS. Will the gentleman allow me a statement?

Mr. MADDOX. Yes.

Mr. LANDIS. While on that point I would like to say that I was very much impressed by the statement made by the gentleman from California here yesterday, to the effect that the superintendent of the rural delivery had stated to a member of this House that, notwithstanding the fact that this service has been placed in the classified service, he would see that the Republican members of Congress would control the appointments. I took it up to the superintendent this morning, and he authorized me to state that the report that he had said anything of that kind was untrue.

Mr. LOUD. I regret to be compelled to correct the gentleman from Indiana all the time, but permit me to say that the gentleman from California made no such statement.

Mr. LANDIS. I certainly understood the gentleman so.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman from Indiana is mistaken. I said that such promises had been made.

Mr. MADDOX. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to submit a few more remarks. I say that from an examination of these figures it seems to me that if the Post-Office Committee wanted to begin a reform, there is wide room to begin somewhere else other than upon our country constituents.

I want to call your attention to the fact that, taking the city-delivery system and the postal clerks upon the train, it forms an army of about 28,000 men, while the rural free-delivery system has about six thousand and some odd men. And while the city-delivery and the railroad-delivery people are extracting from the Treasury about $28,000,000 a year, the rural-delivery service is getting about $3,500,000 a year; and yet these gentlemen become alarmed about the rural free-delivery carriers, and fear they will upset the whole Government. I have heard it said that perhaps the railroads of this country are charging two or three times as much as they ought to charge for transporting the mails. Would not that be a good place to begin "reform?"

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have begun a system of extending the mails to our rural constituencies, and we ought to carry to them the daily mails in every homestead, however remote.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SWANSON. How much more time does the gentleman from Georgia want?

Mr. MADDOX. Five minutes.

Mr. SWANSON. I take pleasure in yielding the gentleman five minutes more; he is making such a good speech. He may have ten minutes if he wishes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is entitled to ten minutes more.

Mr. MADDOX. What I desired to say, Mr. Chairman, was this: I believe we have begun the reform in this matter at the wrong place. In the first place, so far as I know or have ever heard, no complaint has come up from the people in reference to this rural free-delivery system. This cry of "reform" seems to have originated absolutely in the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. Now, if the people do not complain—if nobody complains—why is it that gentlemen begin to curtail the privileges and the rights of these people who live in the country?

But perhaps some gentleman will say in behalf of the committee, "We do not propose to do that; we propose to let out this service by contract." I want to say to this House that recently down in Alabama, under this contract system, a gentleman took a contract to deliver the mails over a 6-mile route, which passed over a river, for $143. After he took the contract he discovered that his ferriage across the river would amount to $150 a year, leaving him $7 in debt. This simply illustrates how far the contract system will go.

Now, I want to say that of all the things upon God Almighty's earth that I want to rid my people of in the Seventh district of Georgia is this infernal contract system of delivering the mails. [Applause.] Of all the disgraceful, damnable things that undertake to represent the United States, this service, in many instances, is the worst. [Renewed applause.] And I speak with a knowledge of conditions that prevail to a large extent in my country.

Now, suppose you submit this matter to contract; suppose the work of delivering the mails by rural carriers over certain routes be given out to the lowest bidder. Under this bill you require that the man who undertakes this service shall be able to read and write and be of good character, etc. Well, unfortunately, down in my county we have lots of negroes who can read and write, and I want to say for their benefit that some of them are of good character and can read and write. Yet they are objectionable to the people as rural carriers. You people on the other side of the House can not understand this question. We must work out this problem for ourselves. You can not help us. You can injure us much by imposing the negro upon the people as rural carriers. This proposition opens up the race question, and for that reason, if for no other, I would stand here and oppose this bill as long as I can speak.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDOX. Yes; for a dozen of them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Do the colored people in the South get contracts under the star-route system?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, some do; take subcontracts at least.

Mr. MADDOX. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. I answer, that in certain parts of the South you can hardly start out on a country road, north, south, east, or west, that you do not see a negro from 15 to 23 years old, half clothed, driving a one-eyed mule, or perhaps with the United States mail bag on his shoulder; and he represents the United States mail service under the star-route system. [Applause.] Is that a sufficient answer to the gentleman? I say that this system is the most disgraceful and damnable business that the Government ever engaged in.

Mr. SHAFROTH. In any part of the South that I have ever visited I have never seen such conditions.

Mr. MADDOX. Why, my friend, you never—you certainly never visited the rural districts. As I have had occasion to say heretofore in this House, if you start out in the rural sections of the South, and especially in that part of the country in which I live, the most miserable and dilapidated conveyance that you meet in the road is a vehicle devoted to carrying the United States mail at 50 cents a day, or some other small sum, the man paying his own expenses.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I understood the gentleman from Georgia to say that the colored people in his section are educated and are of good character. Now, if that be the fact as to the colored man in the South, what is to preclude him from getting these contracts under the present civil-service regulations provided with reference to the rural free delivery?

Mr. MADDOX. Well, I will tell you. As far as I am concerned, in my district, I will take care of that.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That is what I want to get at. I want to know whether the civil service is to be a civil service or whether other influences are to come in and control apart from the civil service.

Mr. MADDOX. The rule says the patrons shall select.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes; I have read the rules, and I propose to have something to say about the rules before this discussion is over. Of all the miserable farces that ever was gotten up in the way of a civil-service examination this is unparalleled.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell us why the system is defective?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I will tell you.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor. I want to read this in answer to the gentleman's inquiry:

The examination as conducted by the special agent or the route inspector shall require only such scholastic ability as may be necessary to enable the applicant to read and write, and shall consist of answering a series of personal questions in the applicant's own handwriting, relating, among other things, to his physical condition, his previous experience, training, and occupation, the length of his residence in the community, and his ability to furnish the necessary equipment and to provide a suitable substitute in cases of emergency; the reading of 25 addressed envelopes or cards, and such other practical tests as will demonstrate the competitor's ability to actually perform the work required. The examination shall further consist of a careful inquiry and report by the special agent or the route inspector as to each competitor's acquaintance with the patrons of the route and the extent to which he has their confidence, his general characteristics, suitability, and fitness for the position.

Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I will show you.

Mr. MADDOX (reading):

And the extent to which he has their confidence.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I will show you how much it answers later on.

Mr. MADDOX (reading):

His general characteristics, suitability, and fitness for the position, and his character and reputation; and in any case where the examiner has doubt as to the competitor's character or reputation, he shall not only make inquiry of the persons given as references in the application, but also consult two or more prominent citizens not mentioned by the applicant.

Now, compare these rules with the system of awarding the contracts to the lowest bidder, and there is no avoiding the conclusion as to which will result in the selection of superior carriers.

Provided, That when selection is to be made for the initial appointment of a carrier on a newly established route, one of the persons nominated by the petitioners will be selected, if in other respects his qualifications are equal to those of the other eligibles; and when a selection is to be made for filling a vacancy in an established route, the person who may have been serving as substitute carrier on the route will be selected, if in other respects his qualifications are equal to those of the other eligibles.

Mr. Chairman, I have shown that the contract system can be made entirely applicable to the postal clerks and to the city carriers, who form an army of 28,000 people, at a cost to the Government of $28,420,000 per annum, who have a close organization and are constantly appealing to Congress for increased salaries, yet they cause no apprehension to the Committee on Post-Office and Roads. If they can be controlled by the orders of the civil service or the Post-Office Department, why apprehend danger from the rural carriers? I have another serious objection to this bill which would cause me to vote against it if I had no other. According to the report of the committee this bill, if it becomes a law, is only intended to put those routes under the contract system that are established after this law goes into effect. This is manifestly wrong and unjust. Some sections of the country are already lined with this service, which will have the benefit of the salaried system, whilst down in my country only a few routes are in operation. My people will be inflicted with the cheap service, perhaps with but little improvement on the star-route service now in vogue down there. My constituents pay the taxes demanded of them by the Government and are entitled to as good service as any other portion of this Union, and as long as I have voice or vote I shall contend for it.

Mr. Chairman, the expenses of this Government are enormous. We are paying the most extravagant amount for pensions ever known. My constituents pay their share of this vast sum. We have spent but recently nearly $1,000,000,000 for war and imperialism. My constituents have contributed their share. In fact, they help to pay all the vast appropriations that are assessed upon the people, and scarcely ever get a dollar of benefit from these appropriations in return; and even now, when reckless extravagance is the order of the day, it does look strange that a fit of economy should strike the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and, while all this wild and reckless expenditure of money is going on, that they should reach and commence a retrenchment in the rural-delivery service, crippling that great institution which promises so much good for the people who live in the rural districts, who have heretofore paid taxes all the time and received no benefit from them. Mr. Chairman, I have always stood for economy in governmental affairs, but we have begun to retrench in the wrong place. I hope this bill will not pass.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ALLEN of Maine having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1545. An act to establish a marine hospital at Savannah, Ga.;

S. 688. An act for the relief of David H. Lewis;

S. 192. An act authorizing the appointment of Allen V. Reed, now a captain on the retired list of the Navy, as a rear-admiral on the retired list of the Navy;

S. 598. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Grand Forks, in the State of North Dakota.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 11611. An act to divide the State of Texas into four judicial districts;

H. R. 61. An act to authorize the establishment of a life-saving station at or near Bogue Inlet, North Carolina;

H. R. 5106. An act for the relief of Rasmussen & Strehlow;

H. R. 5801. An act to authorize the St. Clair Terminal Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River; and

H. R. 7035. An act for the relief of Charles Hurrle.

RURAL FREE-DELIVERY SERVICE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LOUD. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I shall devote my attention to the question to which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] addressed himself in the latter part of his remarks. I want to show what kind of a civil-service regulation this is under which these rural free-delivery carriers are appointed. The first thing to which I call attention is that under these rules every special agent and every route agent is made an auxiliary to this central board of examiners.

They establish what they call a central board under the Civil Service Commission, and they make every special agent and every route inspector an auxiliary to this central board. Now, the rule says that the special agent, after investigating the feasibility of establishing the route petitioned for, shall, in his capacity as a representative of the Commission, conduct the examination of all applicants for the position of carrier.

Now, that is to say, that your civil-service examination for these positions is made by special agents and by route inspectors. And who are they and what qualifications have they to make these examinations? It may be a man who himself can scarcely read or write that, under this regulation, is sent down into my country or into yours to hold an examination for the position of rural free carrier. That is the kind of an examination you have for these men, not the kind that the railway mail postal clerks pass, not the kind that the internal-revenue applicants pass to get positions in these branches of public service, but an examination held by a man who has been appointed to this place on account of his partisan zeal.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Would my friend put in a partisan enemy if he had the appointing power?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I am not saying what I would do, but I am saying what takes place under these rules and regulations, or what may take place under them.

Now, let us see about the examination.

SEC. 7. The special agent or route inspector shall personally conduct the examinations, and must be constantly present.

The peculiar character and unusual scope of the examination and inquiries are given in section 9, which reads:

9. The examination as conducted by the special agent or the route inspector shall require only such scholastic ability as may be necessary to enable the applicant to read and write, and shall consist of answering a series of personal questions in the applicant's own handwriting, relating, among other things, to his physical condition, his previous experience, training, and occupation, the length of his residence in the community, and his ability to furnish the necessary equipment and to provide a suitable substitute in cases of emergency; the reading of 25 addressed envelopes or cards; and such other practical tests as will demonstrate the competitor's ability to actually perform the work required.

But it does not end there.

The examination shall further consist—of a careful inquiry and report by the special agent.

Of what?

You do not stop with the examination of the applicant as to his scholastic qualifications. You do not stop with a practical test of his ability to write and to read addressed envelopes, but you commission your special agent and your route inspector to institute a private inquiry into this man's character, and so forth.

This says:

The examination shall further consist of a careful "inquiry and report by the special agent or the route inspector as to each competitor's acquaintance with the patrons of the route and the extent to which he has their confidence, his general characteristics, suitability, and fitness for the position, and his character and reputation."

That is, you commission him to go out and inquire about all of these things, and this man makes his own report. If he is a partisan and takes up the case of a man who is on the other side of the fence politically from him, he colors his report so as to turn that man down and put in a political friend. They will do it in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred. He submits his report, and if he has doubt——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Do you think there is any danger of their doing that down in this country where the Republicans have no show?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. No; I do not.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Where the Republicans elect their men by contested elections, instead of by fixing up political machines.

Mr. BARTLETT. What country does the gentleman refer to? So far as the part of the country that I know anything about is concerned, that is not a correct statement.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky (reading)— and in any case where the examiner has doubt as to the competitor's character or reputation he shall not only make inquiry of the persons given as references in the application, but also consult two or more prominent citizens not mentioned by the applicant.

Yes, you do not confine him to the persons given as references, but you say to him he may also inquire of two more persons—two more prominent persons—not mentioned as references by the applicant. Now, who is going to judge? Suppose he is a Democrat?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why, no man is appointed to these places unless the people petition for him.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I say the gentleman is wholly uninformed upon that question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hold in my hand the blank form of petition to prove that.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I understand. Just wait for an instant.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will not be so positive in his statement as that.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. If I do not cover the point, then ask me a question at the conclusion of my remarks. Now, he is authorized to inquire of two persons outside of the references given—two prominent persons. Suppose your agent, or route inspector, is a Democrat; he wants to get the Democratic carrier appointed; he makes inquiry of the referees.

Now, he is not satisfied, or at least he pretends not to be, and he goes out and he hunts up two prominent Democrats, and he inquires of them as to the standing, character, and reputation of the Republican applicant for the carrier's position. They say he is not of equal character with the Democratic applicant. That Democratic route agent or inspector makes a report more favorable to the Democratic applicant than he does to the Republican applicant. That report is a part, sir, of the documents that the central board are governed by in making the eligible list. They not only take the examination that the applicant has passed, but they take into consideration likewise the report made by the special agent or route inspector. Now, am I right about that?

Section 10 says:

That after the examination the special agent or the route inspector shall at once forward all the papers to the central board, including a report of the result of his inquiries and observations.

Yes; he has to submit a report of his "inquiries and his observations." He is turned loose to say whatever he pleases as among these various applicants. I am here to say that there will be men in my party, there will be men in your party, that will be willing to color their reports by reason of their political partisanship; there ever has been and always will be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I should like to have a few minutes more.

Mr. LOUD. I will yield the gentleman five minutes, or ten, if he wants it. How much do you want?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Ten minutes.

Mr. LOUD. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. It says that he shall forward all the papers to the central board of examination—including a report of the result of his inquiries and his observations concerning the competitors, and his recommendations as to those best qualified.

This route agent, not the Civil Service Commission, not the central board, the route agent has to submit his recommendation concerning these competitors, in which he is to recommend the one which he thinks is best qualified.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. In a few minutes.

Upon receiving the papers of an examination, the central board of examiners shall proceed to rate the same, the rating to be determined by a careful consideration of the qualifications of the competitors, as shown by all the papers submitted by the special agent or the route inspector.

Yes; by all the papers. They are not confined to the scholastic examination made; they are not confined to the recommendations as to character or reputation, but the central board is likewise to consider the recommendation of this route agent; and in nine cases out of ten I am prepared to predict that the route agent's recommendation will control the central board. Further, I want to say to this House—I believe I have demonstrated the fact—that this civil-service examination provided for by this Department is unlike any civil-service examination ever provided under any law of the United States or under any rules or regulations of the Civil-Service Commission.

You simply turn these special agents and route inspectors out to select the carriers upon the free-delivery routes of the United States, and their recommendations control in 99 out of 100 cases. Now, the gentleman from Tennessee a while ago referred to the fact that the patrons would control. But what does this rule say? The rule says:

That when selection is to be made for the initial appointment of a carrier on a newly established route, one of the persons nominated by the petitioners will be selected if in other respects his qualifications are equal to those of the other eligibles.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. "Nominated by the petitioners?"

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How else do you want them nominated?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Wait a moment.

If in other respects his qualifications are equal to those of the other eligibles.

If your special agent or route inspector has so reported on the examination and his investigation as to place others higher up in the eligible list than the man nominated by the patrons on the route, the latter inevitably fails under this regulation of the Department. I am perfectly willing to say, Mr. Chairman, that whatever system you may adopt for the appointment of these carriers, that politics is going to control in the main, whether the one party or the other is in power. I am candid enough to say I believe that. In this matter I am seeking to help frame such a law as I believe will get the best service for the people of the United States at the least expenditure of money.

I would be willing to see written into the law a provision that would do away with this alleged civil-service examination and permit the people along these routes to nominate their preference for carrier and require that the Department shall be bound by that nomination. I am willing to write it into the law that that shall be the rule governing this matter. I believe it will come nearer taking it out of politics than any other provision that can be adopted, unless it is the contract system.

Mr. SIMS. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Can you tell me whether any colored men are now serving as letter carriers in the cities?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I am unable to answer that question. There is not a city in the district from which I come. I represent an agricultural district. I am in favor of the extension of this service, but in extending it I do not wish to build up the greatest political machine that has ever been constructed since the foundation of the American Republic. I am unwilling to give my voice and support to any law that I believe will build up an organization of that kind for your party or for mine.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with these few remarks, I close what I have to say.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Before the gentleman concludes I want him to yield to me.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman stated a few minutes ago that the people, as petitioners, had nothing to do with the selection of the carrier. Now I want to show to the gentleman by this official paper itself that he is mistaken. Here is a blank used by the Department headed "Applicants for position of carrier." On the left-hand side there is a column for the "names of the applicants," and on the opposite side a column for the names of those "by whom they are proposed," that is, the people or petitioners. In this left-hand column a thousand—any number—could petition for the appointment for A, B, C, and D.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I thought I made that proposition plain. The rule concerning that is this: In the appointment of these men, that man will be selected who is petitioned for by the patrons, if, in other respects, his qualifications are equal to those of the other eligibles.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think the majority of the people would petition for a man who could not read or write, or who was a man of bad character?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman from Tennessee seems to misapprehend the subject entirely. The eligible list is made up by the central board of examination on the recommendation made by the route agent, who holds the examination and sends in the papers to the board, with his own recommendation accompanying the papers. The central board then rates these men on this report of his, and, of course, he colors his report so as to give his partisan friends a higher rating than he does for those of the opposite party. So that when it comes to filling the vacancy the petitioners' choice can not be regarded if of different politics to the inspector, because there is a man rated higher than the man they have petitioned for.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But suppose two men had each a maximum rating on everything, and more people petitioned for one than the other; which would the central board appoint?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Under this rule, of course, if they are all of the same class, why, it may be possible that the man recommended by the people would obtain it, but there never will be such a state of facts. If my friend from Tennessee has not observed enough in politics to know that regardless of whether it is our party or whether it is the other party we can work under circumstances of that kind so as to favor our own partisan friends, then he has served his time very poorly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman is too good a lawyer to say that he does not know that where discretion is lodged in an officer, as in all these cases, even the star-route cases, when he exercises that discretion, that is the end of it, and it is the end of it whether he is a Democratic or whether he is a Republican who decides the case.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. But under this system they would or might build up an eligible list based upon the rating that the inspector or agent recommends to secure partisan advantages at the expense of the public service.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And that is referred to this central board of five?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. They are merely mechanical in their work.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, if the board is of no account, if the members have no sense, honesty, or integrity——

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I did not say that; but the rules and regulations under which they work confine them to the papers and reports returned by the route inspector, and they can not consider anything else.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They can pass upon it, and as I am officially informed, reversed one of his rulings or selections.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. They have no authority whatever to disregard anything that the special agent or the route inspector returns to them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Not to "disregard" it, but consider all the papers and the report of the officer and affirm or reverse his opinion from which there is an appeal to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. No, sir; they are to consider that.

Now, I am somewhat astonished at the position of my friend from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is unwilling, he says, to leave it discretionary, under this proposed act, with the Postmaster-General to pass upon the character and reputation of these contractors; yet he is willing on the other hand, under the civil-service rules established by this Department, to leave it to the local route inspector to pass upon the character and reputation of these men. So far as I am concerned, I would prefer to leave the determination upon their character and reputation with the Postmaster-General.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOUD. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] one hour or such part thereof as he may desire to occupy.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, if the provision of this bill which is being discussed—for it is noticeable that in all the talk about the bill but a single feature has been alluded to—shall be productive of no other results than the debate which it has developed—the presenting to the House, and, I hope, to the country, a view of the future vastness of this growing service which men are justly eulogizing here, and none think more highly of it than I do, and the conditions which we are not merely anticipating but foresee, and the problems which they must raise for solution—then no bill which has been before this House at this session, and none, I apprehend, which may come before it, will perform a better or more timely service to the country.

The figures of speech indulged in by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] are not mere oratory. Mr. Chairman, they are, I apprehend, expressive, with the accuracy of a vision of that which is to come. The people of this country will construe—aye, they have construed—rural free delivery to mean something more than this 20-mile-route arrangement that we now have and are talking about. They have construed, and they are going to compel Congress to construe, rural free delivery to mean a universal free delivery of the mail to practically every family in the United States, and they are right. There is not a man on this floor or elsewhere who has given any consideration to this subject, especially if he has been in contact with the people, who has not understood that to be the condition, the temper, and irresistible demand of the rural and suburban people.

Now, we are, to use the phrase, "up against" one of the greatest internal problems in both a financial and political sense that the people of this country have for many years, if ever, met. In my judgment it is an understatement of the facts to say that in the near future this system means the service of 30,000,000 people by 60,000 carriers at an expense of more than $100,000,000 a year, if the service goes on under present conditions. At least this bill is not premature if it compels this House to think upon the subject. This is the hour to take into consideration the really serious questions of the plans and the methods by which you are in the future to conduct that vast service and the economies connected with it. The gentleman from Indiana, when he talks about a salary of $1,000 a year and horses and wagons, only draws the picture which is drawn elsewhere, and in high quarters and among some carriers. That, sir, is what is coming if things go on under present conditions.

Mr. LANDIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. LANDIS. If that compensation is not right, are you in favor of reducing the compensation of the city carriers accordingly?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I will come to that in time. It has nothing to do with this question. We are now dealing with a separate subject—something comparatively new—something that is about to develop into proportions never contemplated by anybody up to the present time—something that is going to cost more than the present expenses of the Post-Office Department. Now is the time to consider it, and not resort to the old subterfuge resorted to alike by enthusiasts and demagogues, which is to walk around the circle and say, "I do not see any more reason for cutting at one place than another." But the gentleman's question is an admission of the correctness of my statement.

Mr. LANDIS. My simple question is, whether the farmer, living in the country, away from the post-office, shall be granted the same advantages enjoyed by the man who lives in town. There is nothing "separate" or distinct about it. The simple question is, whether you will concede to the farmer what the farmer is willing to concede to you.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Have you finished your speech?

Mr. LANDIS. I have said all I care to say at this time.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Now, the statement made by the gentleman, absurd as it is, is no more absurd than most of the arguments in opposition to this bill. The salary of carriers at $1,000, with thousands of farmers willing to do the work at little if any more than half the figure, and with the Government wagon painted a fancy color and a gentleman in uniform with brass buttons and a horse bought of a jockey at a high price, which the farmer knows was a swindle and sees go to pieces under ordinary work, is not a part of the vision that delights the farmers' eyes and has nothing to do with the efficiency of the service.

Mr. LANDIS. If that is the basis on which the gentleman makes his speech——

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Why, it is perfect folly to talk about these carriers—to imagine that they are the rural population of the country. They are not the populace. Under this system, when matured, they will be 1 per cent of the voting population of the country, enough to carry Indiana one way or the other decidedly; but I am not discussing that phase of the question. The salaried officer, 1 to 500, is not the people. This carrier who is to drive across the country in a painted wagon that is the delight of the farm girl in your vision, who shall wheel up to the farmer's door in the rig that I have described, and in a uniform with polished buttons, to deliver a letter, will still not constitute the rural population, and he will not bear very much relation or resemblance to it in its industrial pursuits.

I do not know why people should get under what my friend calls a state of mental strabismus on this question; but these gentlemen who talk about the carrier in a Government wagon, on a salary, in a service giving an annual job to the jockeys to furnish 30,000 horses, imagine they are doing something for the rural population of the country. The farmer has not asked that his mail be delivered in that way. He is a business man. He knows the value to him of having his mail come to his door, and he knows a great deal better than the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] and these other high-salary enthusiasts the value of performing that service. He knows that he is a part of the tax-paying force of the country, and you are not going to make him happy nor are you going to flatter him by parading robbery or waste before him twice a day.

Mr. LANDIS. Now, just a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. LANDIS. That being true, does that not absolutely dispose of the alarm of the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], who is afraid that the carrier will organize the country, and thus overawe Congress?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. It has nothing to do with it.

Mr. LANDIS. It is an absolute answer; and it is an absolute answer to another proposition.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The gentleman's logic seems to have gone on a furlough to-day. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANDIS. . Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The kind of a rig that this official is to drive, who pays for it, and the salary that he is to receive has no relation whatever to his numerical proportion to the voting population nor to his political influence. I will be perfectly frank with the gentleman and say that I think the more painted wagons you put him on, and the more Government horses the jockeys ring in that go down under his driving, and the more of like tomfoolery you surround him with the less political influence he will have on the agricultural element of the country. I am a little way with you on that.

Mr. LANDIS. It is his wagon and his horse. The Government surrounds him with nothing.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. It is neither his wagon nor his horse under the scheme as contemplated, nor under the speech of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LANDIS. Oh, I beg your pardon.

Mr. BARTLETT. He buys it and pays for it.

Mr. LANDIS. I simply insist on the service going on as it is now.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I ask the question, Why should the Government furnish the horse and all that? I know and you know that when you raise these carriers' salaries to the figure you are talking about, to correspond with the salaries of city carriers, these rural gentlemen with mighty influences behind them can come down here, with the service organized and grown, more of a political power than they are now, and the service seems now to be dangerous, to be a master on this floor. I know that gentlemen will ask then, "Why are you discriminating against the countryman to the extent of the cost of his horse and his wagon?" and say he is as much entitled to be furnished with both as the fellow who has to deliver mail with wagons in the city, and the House will say, "Amen; the countryman is entitled to as much as the city man," and the horse jockies will send up a chorus of amens that will make you think that you are as happy as a revival.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The rural carriers will be young men, inexperienced, and not ring men. As to the political phase of this question, what will be the comparison between the present fourth-class postmaster, who controls politics in the district, and these rural carriers?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Well, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman's question imports anything, it is a plaint that the fourth-class postmasters exercise a political influence.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. They exercise a wonderful influence in your district.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. First, they do not have 3 per cent of the opportunity to exercise political influence now that the carriers will have; they do not go through the country and come in contact with the people in the same way. Secondly, however, if they are a disturbing political influence to-day, in cahoots with rural carriers as their messengers to go through the country and do their work, they will become infinitely more dangerous to the gentleman.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And the horse jockeys, too?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes; and the horse jockeys will be with them.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Under the star-route system now all the rural people in the country come to the fourth-class post-offices.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There the postmaster can manipulate politics.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Oh, yes; the people come to the post-office when they do not send their children. They all come at or about one time, upon the arrival of the mails, and as soon as they get their letters and papers they go away. I do not know how it is down in your country, but up in mine during the busy season—six months of the year, at any rate—the farmer does not have time, if he had the inclination, to sit around the post-office. We work.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Have you been dealing with horse traders, or have you been to see David Harum? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, this may be something to laugh about, but I lived in that serious phase of national life when I saw this horse business constitute one of the important items in the accounts of the Treasury of the United States. Now, what have gentlemen said against this bill? I do not think, sir, that it is worth while to argue the affirmative of it much longer. As to this particular provision in this bill, if it was not here, and if that was not the specific proposition before us I would talk in the most general terms. I say that if we do not shut our eyes, willfully determined not to see and to understand, then we shall know that this service in the near future means just what I have said, a service to 30,000,000 of people with 60,000 carriers, and more than one-half of that 30,000,000 people will be served by teams, which, with the civil service organization going on as it is now, with the whooping sentiment behind it of the eloquent gentleman from Indiana and his type, the Government will be as sure to furnish those teams as the Capitol is to stand here or Congress to meet.

Now, what do gentlemen interpose against it? Some weep over the old Brady star-route frauds, a system that has been buried so long that the moss on its headstone is already long.

Mr. HILL. And the resurrection come.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. And resurrection come.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who says this is a resurrection, whether he comes from Connecticut or Michigan, whether he knows all about the money question or all about the beet-sugar question, is away behind time and has no knowledge of this bill. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. But suppose history is to repeat itself?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. It may, under like conditions, but there is no fraud under the star-route law as it now exists requiring the bidder to reside on his route and personally perform the service.

Mr. LANDIS. It does not require that.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. None such will arise under this bill. Oh, but it is a contract system, and a contractor is a member of a family; the gentleman does not know its origin; he does not have possession of the family tree. Brother LITTLEFIELD—pardon me, the gentleman from Maine—a legal light, would know that. Oh, it has brought discredit to the nation; and gentlemen get down low and bring up the ancient conditions buried with the Brady frauds. Why we might well believe here to-day that our ships built under contract would not float, that the harbors dug out by contract would not bear vessels upon their bosoms, and contract guns would not shoot; that our Navy must now logically be at the bottom of Manila Bay if there was not something of it left to go down at Santiago.

A MEMBER. Or the loop.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. That is perfectly absurd, Mr. Chairman. I do not want to use harsh language; but I say the experience that was had on the star-route contracts cause the elimination of every scandal from the system. Gentlemen say that the interpretation of this bill is not that the bidder who secures the contract must personally perform the service. The report says that is the construction. If there is any doubt about it, do not spend a day or two in caviling; amend it by a phrase.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAHON. As this contract system is such a good thing to have, why not put all the post-offices under the contract system, and save $10,000,000?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. It would be possible, and if that were done, the gentleman from Georgia would not lose his cause of complaint.

Mr. MAHON. Why not amend your bill and put it that way?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. That is the old cry—break your circle somewhere else.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Why not put the city carriers under contract also?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The gentleman asks what objection there is to putting city carriers under contract. I am going to make some reply to that question, although I think it is an unfair and irrelevant method of argument which is followed in interrogations here, of asking why something else can not be done than that which is proposed to be done and which is generally absolutely another thing.

First, the city carrier lives in a massed population, composed of residential and business sections. The weight of mail in the different sections varies materially at different parts of the year, and the carrier under the contract system fixing the route to which the carrier must adhere, without transfer, from year's end to year's end, would involve the employment of more carriers, which would, if the service shall be precisely the same, result in increased cost. Secondly, it would involve the necessity of higher bids. It could be done; but that question does not arise in this case now.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Rural routes are being changed constantly and adjusted. Experience shows that a new route that was traveled a month ago is not traveled to-day precisely the same.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Do not they have some congestion some part of the year?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The people live in the same place year in and year out. It is not the rural population that travels. It is not they who go to Newport or to Europe or elsewhere in the summer. There is a change in the city, and there is an increase of business about Christmas tide, for instance.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Christmas affects the country just the same.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. If it affects the country it affects the people in the same spot.

But, now, Mr. Chairman, without pursuing that, I find that I had left the subject of the probable future cost of this service too soon. The gentleman has led me to recall it.

Now, if gentlemen will look at the last paragraph on page 2 of the minority report they will see that this report clearly contemplates, if this system shall be continued, the eight-hour system. It is legitimate to call attention to that as on the question of cost. I am an eight-hour man; there is no disguise about that. But here is a separate matter, a matter which, gentlemen say, has passed the experimental stage. I think the people are bound to have it, but it is just coming up to the serious point of the experiment. You keep this form of the service, cover it into the Post-Office Department civil service, where it will go or has gone, bring it under all the laws and regulations of the Department, and as sure as time passes it means a material shortening of all the routes, or it means a substitute system which shall materially increase the expense of the rural-delivery system.

Again, in arguing against this bill, gentlemen have suddenly become alarmed lest the American citizen is incompetent to take care of himself in a business way; lest he can not be trusted to bid on a contract for carrying mail, the weight of which can be easily estimated and never amounts to more than a driving load over a given territory daily. They are afraid that it will be taken too cheap and the service will become disreputable. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] dwelt upon that—left and returned to that phase of the subject time after time—until it must be true, since he has been connected with this minority report. He has dwelt upon that feature until he can not look out yonder to the landscape of his native State but he sees climbing the hill a one-eyed mule, with one ear lopping more than the other, both fore knees sprung, but one sprung a little more than the other, a spavin on one hind leg and a knuckle on the other; a cart with different sized wheels, with a soap box for a body, and with the tires wound on with rope yarn, and exclaims, "Oh, see, ye prophets; this is what I am saving my beloved country from!" [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I can not speak for the South; I can not speak for the West, but I have faith in the intelligence of the people of all sections. I can speak for the agricultural districts of New Jersey, and I say that responsible men there—responsible men, I repeat—under the provisions of this bill are not going to bid for these contracts below what they can perform the service for, or, if they should, they will perform their contracts for a year and will not do it again. But what does the committee, what does the Department say? Pardon me for referring to the Department, for almost every argument I have heard on this floor, every statement set out in the minority report, are but an echo of what has been heard there. In one paragraph they tell us incompetent and worthless men are going to bid and get the contract at less than they can do the work for.

The language of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is something like this: The man with the poorest horse or mule, with the poorest cart and the poorest address, the least competent to do the service, is going to get the contract because he is going to do it cheap. But when the chairman of the committee had urged upon the members of the House and urged generally that this service was going to reach an enormous figure, and that a cheaper, but a good and reliable, way should be found for doing it, it was necessary to counteract the argument of cheapness, and lo and behold, on the last page of this report there is a table which says that the statement on page 2 is a lie and the conclusions are false, because there under the bidding system on the star routes, under the law that requires men to live upon the route, the rates have gone up until they are costing more than they are paying the rural letter carriers.

Now, both statements can not be true. Both premises can not be true as a basis for drawing conclusions. The gentlemen opposing the bill may take their choice as to which side of their own contradiction they will eventually adopt; but the House should require them to make a selection and confess whether it is the last page or the second page that misleads.

Now, this question seems to be, in my judgment, a more gigantic thing than the public or this House has yet realized at all. It is the problem, I repeat, of, in the near future, serving 30,000,000 people by 60,000 carriers, at a cost for the system of more than $100,000,000. It means through the rural country where the men are householders, taking the household to represent five people and a carrier to serve 100 families, which he does not, because that would put five families to the mile, and they can not get that number on any road among large farms; but even with that liberal calculation it means 1 per cent of the voting population.

If the fellow has a wife, she will count one for that purpose; that means 2 per cent. If he has a couple of brothers, that means four. And thus the force is augmented with the entire relationship. Gentlemen may pooh-pooh it as they like, but I say it becomes a power great enough to turn the State of New York, for instance, heavily one way or the other.

But leave that out if you like. Realize, as you must realize, that the day is coming when something must be done. Realize, as you must realize, that the sooner you do it the easier it can be done, and that the longer it goes on, with this service growing at the rate it does, the more difficult the question becomes to deal with. Why, sir, there is not a man now speaking with authority who will tell you he expects to see this Administration close with less than 35,000 of these carriers. If the power that has been manifested through the press, and is now made manifest on this floor, shall multiply in proportion to the increased appropriations required until it is four times as great as now, there is some ground for apprehension that it will be irresistible except in time of a real crisis demanding action so imperative that the House will act because fear is overcome by fright.

So I leave off, as I began, by saying that if the discussion of this proposition serves no other purpose than to call the attention of Congress and of as much of the country as will pay attention to it to the gigantic proportions to which this problem is growing and the rapidity with which it is getting there, and the early date at which it is going to arise in all its force and all its size, it will have performed a great service.

Is there a man here who is willing to contemplate a bureau of the Post-Office Department (no matter what bureau) with an office force adequate to the management of the business of 60,000 carriers—with those 60,000 carriers in the field—with the civil service in force making its organized demands for increase of salaries and expenditures on the one hand, and to be agents of that power which civil service never restrains and never can restrain—the Government? Laugh at it, if you please; belittle it, if you please, today, but either as a business problem, a financial problem, or a political problem, the day is coming, and coming soon, when you will belittle it in neither of the three forms.

Mr. WATSON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. You are opposed to rural free delivery, as I understand?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I want to make it possible for rural free delivery to live. I claim a very full share of the credit and responsibility for the system.

Mr. WATSON. You are not in favor of restricting it to the regions where we already have it? You are in favor of extending it universally?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes; I want it extended all over the country; and it is going there; you can not restrain it if you would.

Mr. WATSON. I do not want to restrain it.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. The gentleman from New Jersey wants it to live without sustenance.

Mr. WATSON. The gentleman from New Jersey seems to be complaining because of the immense proportions which he says this institution is yet to attain. How does he propose to restrict or limit it, if the rural free delivery is to be universally extended?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. This bill does not restrict it. I would not restrict. I want it put upon a business and lasting basis.

Mr. WATSON. How? We shall have just as many carriers under this bill as under the present system, shall we not?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. They will be contract carriers; they will not be a part of a bureau of the Government, a part of the civil service, in office for life, part of a political machine, part of a salary-demanding horse-demanding force.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Can the gentleman from New Jersey tell this committee how many local post-offices have been discontinued as a result of inaugurating the rural free-delivery service?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. No; I have not the figures.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Have not a great many of those offices been done away with because under the rural-delivery system one man can do the work formerly done by 25 or 30 postmasters?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. There may have been some; but generally the rural people, where I have had experience, insist upon retaining their local post-offices, if possible.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you know how many have been succeeded by the rural carrier?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I do not know how many have been abolished.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I speak of my own neighborhood. There were 18 or 19 post-offices, the business of which is now done by 2 or 3 rural carriers.

Mr. COWHERD. I can give the gentleman the exact figures if he wants them. There have been 1,226 fourth-class post-offices abolished during the last fiscal year, and the saving by their abolition has been a little less than $80,000.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Well, then, as a general proposition eight carriers have abolished one fourth-class post-office.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There have been a great many more post-offices abolished than there have been carriers appointed.

Mr. COWHERD. Oh, no.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. There are 8,000 rural carriers, and there have been 1,200 fourth-class post-offices abolished.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. One rural carrier will do the work of three or four post-offices, will he not?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] has given us the correct figures.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not admit that he is correct. I think he is correct generally, but I think I am generally correct, too.

Mr. COWHERD. I will show that I am correct.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Of course the gentleman thinks he is correct. Generally he is, and usually I am correct, and I think in this instance I am.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. If the gentleman from Tennessee believes that the rural free-delivery system has abolished more than 8,000 fourth-class postmasters, he is believing easily and erroneously, as a great many gentlemen do, things that they bring up against this bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a moment right there. I have received a little information on that point. My colleague [Mr. BROWNLOW] states that in his district alone, in one county, 60 postmasters have been done away with and 30 carriers have been appointed to take their place. That is a pretty good ratio.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. That is entirely exceptional.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That may be an exceptional case, but it is the same way all through my country.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will conclude in two minutes. I want to speak with the fullest respect of every source of opposition to this bill. If there have been any two arguments yet presented by the opposition which are consistent with each other, then I have failed to comprehend them, and that is my fault. Many argue with emphasis that this is going to make the service too cheap. On the other side they present a table to show that the plan adopted in this bill, as applied to star routes, has increased the cost. They argue that the same system might as well be applied to city carriers, and then proceed to set up facts which themselves present difficulties which do not arise in the case of the rural free-delivery route. They argue apparently—and that is the argument of the gentleman from Indiana—that the more salary you pay the rural carrier and the more horses and wagons you give him the better service you are giving to the farmer. As I have said, uniforms, Government horses, and red wagons are not service, and there is nobody on the continent better able to judge of that than the farmer himself.

Some have argued that this system under which the contracts can be thrown up in thirty days will bring in a lot of bidders for a short term, and that they will not keep the contract over the winter when the weather is inclement. Others argue that the farmer is out of business during the winter and will be a low bidder for the contract in October, when there is nothing to do on the farm, but that he will throw it up in May. And so on from the beginning to the end. I say again if there are any two reasons urged against this bill that are not contradictory and which do not in a large measure answer each other, then I have been too thick of comprehension to perceive them.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the inefficiency of the star-route system in this country, owing to the subletting of contracts, has given a great incentive to the rural free-delivery system in this country, and if the star-route service is not absolutely inefficient under the present system of subcontracting and subletting?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. First, Mr. Chairman, I do not understand that there is at present any subletting of contracts.

Mr. BLACKBURN. On the star routes of this country?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. No. Secondly, it is not contemplated by this bill that there shall be any subletting of contracts, and I have said before that if anybody doubts the construction of the bill on that point, it requires but a phrase to banish the doubt.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman knows it is done, does he not?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. No; my understanding is that the contracts are let to-day to the people who reside on the route and perform the service.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the gentleman not know that contracts are sublet frequently, and that the postmasters, owing to the inefficiency of the contractors, have had to supply carriers themselves?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. That used to be.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I know it exists now.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Right on that point, Mr. Chairman, because the arguments presented in opposition to this bill have been very unfair, gentlemen bring forward instances, one after another, of the distances that stage coaches travel on the star route and the amount of pay which they get for carrying the mail, and they exhibit those as ridiculous instances of how low men will bid under a competitive service.

The main fact in such cases, which has been concealed here by every speaker, is that in all those cases of inadequate compensation as it appears on the surface, these carriers are stage drivers who run a stage from the railroad station to a place off the railroad, and the carrying of the mail is the mere incidental carrying of a bag which weighs less than a passenger, and in so far as they are concerned, the question can fairly be computed on the basis of a passenger each way every day in the year. It is a mere auxiliary, something additional to their regular business. Now, that is the fact about the cases of these low bids in the star-route service. The people who make the low bids are not mail carriers in the sense urged here, as though that was the exclusive business in which they were engaged, and as though they made that bid as their compensation for going daily over that route. They are going over the route daily anyhow.

Mr. PEARRE. I want to ask the gentleman whether this prohibition against subcontracting has not been put in force only since the establishment of the rural free delivery, and have not all the improvements in the star-route system, if there have been any improvements made, been made since the inauguration of the rural free-delivery system?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I do not know. From the form of the gentleman's question, I infer that the gentleman has joined the ranks of those enthusiasts who believe that the thing which they advocate drags all other good in its train. It seems to me that argument is of the same kind as the statistics which show that the price of wheat has regulated the price of everything else on earth from the beginning.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. If the star route has been improved, if the abuses that grew up under the system have been stopped within a date that covers the existence of the rural-delivery service, that is no more an argument that there is a connection between that fact and the influence of the rural free-delivery service than the fact that the Marconi system has been discovered during the gentleman's lifetime is proof that he is the source of that discovery.

Mr. PEARRE. I do not want to make a speech in the center of the gentleman's speech, but I think the connection can be very readily traced, and it can be traced in this way, that these improvements and corrections of the abuses of the star-route system have been made by those gentlemen who, seeing the great improvement in the public service from the rural free-delivery system, have made this improvement for the purpose of saving their own old-time and inefficient star-route system. That is the connection between the two.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. If it be true that the gentlemen who are to administer the contract system under this provision, under this or some future bill, have already had such experience and made such a successful demonstration, would not they be the better able to execute its provisions?

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman will allow me, some six years ago, and each year succeeding, the Post-Office Department asked for legislation to do what they have ultimately done. So before rural delivery was established the Post-Office Department asked Congress to legislate so they could inaugurate the very system that ultimately they did inaugurate.

Mr. PEARRE. In what respect?

Mr. LOUD. Why, to confine the bidder to the route.

Mr. LANDIS. But they do not require him to perform the service.

Mr. PEARRE. Did they also ask that the carrier be required on the star route to collect and deliver the mail, which has only been required here, according to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, within a year?

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman is mistaken about that. Two or three years ago, I think it was three years ago, that was done in the State of South Carolina.

Mr. PEARRE. That was put into effect by the order of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. LOUD. It was done in South Carolina three years ago.

Mr. PEARRE. But this is since the inauguration of the rural free delivery.

Mr. LOUD. Why, three years ago there was such a little of this free rural delivery that it could scarcely be found with a microscopic eye.

Mr. PEARRE. When was it put into the District?

Mr. LOUD. A year ago.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit me, I have the figures here, and there are just a few of them I would like to read.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. If only a few, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have turned now to the Post-Office report, the last issued, and find of the star routes discontinued there are 1,031, of the fourth-class postmasters 1,777, making a total of 2,808, showing that my friend from Missouri is wrong in the figures that he gave.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, no; you are putting the star routes and the postmasters together.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why, of course; star routes discontinued 1,038, and fourth-class postmasters 1,777.

Mr. LOUD. The question of star routes discontinued has never been referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Here we have the official report, which shows that 1,777 postmasters had cost $120,221.43 and the star routes $173,404.41.

Mr. COWHERD. I will say to my friend that what I said was that 1,226 were discontinued during the year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This was for the fiscal year ending last June.

Mr. LOUD. Year by year for twenty years past a thousand fourth-class postmasters have been discontinued every year.

Mr. LATIMER. With the permission of the gentleman, I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, who stated that the Department had asked the legislation looking to requiring the carrier to live on the route, if, as chairman of the committee, he ever made any effort to get the legislation in accordance with the desire of the Department on that line?

Mr. LOUD. I do not know what that has to do with the gentleman's speech, but I will say that I did not.

Mr. LATIMER. I understand that the Department is opposed to this contract system, and that there are many members of this House who would like to have free delivery that they have in towns of 10,000 population. There is a discrimination now against those smaller towns, because we have free delivery in cities of 10,000 population, or 10,000 receipts, and in the country we have rural delivery, and these towns are discriminated against. Now, we have an effort made to put the carrier under the contract system and leave the city carrier to receive a salary. What I want to ask is, if this committee is in the interest of economy—that is the object of this bill—why spend $17,000,000 on the city carriers on a salary system? I see nothing about economy in that, and yet they want to apply that to the rural districts, where there is only seven millions spent out of fourteen millions in the cities. If economy is what you want, if we are to have a better service by the contract system, why not let that out, and come in here with a bill that will reach this question all along the line, and let us have economy in a just and direct way.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. That speech has been made several times, Mr. Chairman.

A MEMBER. But it has not been answered.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. It has been answered. City delivery is not growing in anything like such a ratio as is rural-delivery matter.

Mr. LATIMER. If the gentleman will permit me right there, if it is wrong in the country, why is it not wrong in the city? If the principle is wrong, why not correct it?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I have stated to-day, as clearly as I could, the difficulties that would beset the contract system in the cities, but independent of all that, here is a system in its youth, aye, comparatively in its infancy, of 8,000 carriers, and we have seen that it means in the near future 30,000 carriers and a correspondingly large bureau. If I stood here now advocating a bill such as the gentleman suggests, those in favor of the city carriers could ask with many-fold more emphasis, "Why do you not start right in the new and growing system instead of first stopping and trying to reform the matter which has about got its growth, which will not augment its evils, if there be evils, and on which you could save less money if you abolished it entirely than the other will grow into in a single year?" That would be an answer. Gentlemen come in here and fairly howl, "If you are going to do something, why do you discriminate against the country? Why do you assault the rural-mail service?" If that is not nonsense, I beg to be excused. When did a proposition to reform the service or change a system and put it on a better basis and substitute a better system become an attack or a discrimination against that service?

Gentlemen seem to think that any legislation is a discrimination against this service—just as the gentleman from Indiana seems to think, and he voices the sentiment of all of them—until the rural carriers are raised to the salary basis of the city carrier, plus the Government horse and wagon, they are discriminated against. I am not here, Mr. Chairman, to draw any comparisons between the rural and the city carrier in their respective positions of hardship or labor, the cost of living, or the intelligence required of them. I am going to say, after having given some study to that subject, that if you will hang on the wall the picture of the rural carrier, with his horse and wagon, or of the star-route carrier, with his horse and wagon, covered in to shut out the storms and the sun, and the horse to do the pulling, it would make a very comfortable looking picture compared with that of the city carrier, who in sun or rain or snow, and in the hot days of the summer, is loaded with his sack and trudging from door to door.

There is another element, as I have intimated, that should come into this. I speak not against it as a principle, but as a fair element of expense to be calculated. Just as sure as this service goes on as it is now you are going to have what the gentleman from Indiana demands. You can not restrain it. You will have salaries equivalent to city carriers, plus the Government horse and wagon, plus the hours of service by law, plus the leave and sick leave, plus a substitute system, matters that will make the estimate of one hundred millions a year grossly inadequate. In this estimate, and in this only, have I belittled the system. [Applause.]

Mr. SWANSON. I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I listened with regret to the chairman of the committee yesterday when he stated that the rural free-delivery system of this Government, of which he claimed to be the father, had been continued thus far as a purely political organization, and that this was an effort to take it out of that class. I have followed that gentleman in voting, without inquiry as a rule, for the past seven years, in accordance with the reports of his committee, which he presented to this House. I regret that that statement will lead me in the future to examine more carefully the reports which he presents here. The gentleman says he was the father of this system.

Mr. LOUD. I beg the pardon of the gentleman from Connecticut. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. HILL. Well, I understood him to say that he was willing to be the father, and he can take his choice. Three or four weeks ago I presented an amendment to the deficiency bill, increasing the salary of the rural free-delivery carriers, believing that it is not large enough. I then said to the chairman of this committee that I saw no way to overcome the inequalities which I saw existed in the service except by putting it on the contract system.

I had not investigated the subject; I had not studied it for myself, and I did not at that time see any way by which the inequalities of the service could be corrected except by putting it on the contract system. Even the gentleman from California himself admitted that the compensation then given was too small. As a result I have given a little study to the question to try and satisfy myself whether it was better to continue this service on a salary basis or put it on the contract system, and I think I have followed up somewhat the method of investigation pursued by this committee, or by the officers of the Department of the United States Government, by which for six years they have been satisfied to have it continue upon a salary basis.

I remember distinctly that seven years ago, I think it was, the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads sat right where the gentleman from Mississippi now sits, and I went to him and begged and pleaded with him that he would allow me to introduce an amendment to the appropriation bill giving $50,000 for the continuance of the experimental rural free-delivery service, and he declined. If he was the father of the system, he certainly repudiated his child seven years ago.

Since that time other gentlemen have had charge of that service. Among them, Hon. Charles Emory Smith, who has helped to build it up, and, in my judgment, has had quite as much to do with it, perhaps, as the gentleman from California. And there is Hon. Perry Heath. Both of those gentlemen claim to have had something to do with this service, and both to-day unqualifiedly indorse the salary system. Go even back of that.

Hon. Thomas L. James, who was Postmaster-General some years ago, has not thought it undignified on his part to come out in an interview in the New York papers declaring unqualifiedly in favor of the salaried system. So that men of intelligence—and I include in this category the members of this committee—have thought it wise to continue the salaried system and to report year after year to Congress that it was the best that could be devised. If it was not so, I submit they should at least have used their intelligence to report a better one long before this. They have gone on under this salaried system until now, when we have 8,000 carriers, something suddenly comes up which leads them to recommend a change in the whole system.

Now, what was the consideration that prompted these gentlemen to make the original report in favor of a salaried system and to continue indorsing their system until this time. I knew there must be a good excuse or a good reason for their action, and I have been looking around to find what it is. I hold in my hand a document entitled "Rural free-delivery service in European countries." It is signed by Hon. E. F. LOUD, and in it he takes up the rural free-delivery service as carried on in all the countries of Europe.

At the time this system was inaugurated in this country, the chairman of the Post-Office Committee applied to the Post-Office Department and asked them to apply to the State Department to ascertain through the diplomatic representatives of the United States in the various countries of Europe how the system was carried on there. This was not a new experiment in Europe, as with us. This document, signed by Mr. LOUD himself, or rather prepared in response to inquiries by him and with his name attached to it, gives the experience of nearly all the countries of Europe in reference to this matter; and I propose very briefly to cite from this document some of that experience.

Allow me to say, by way of preliminary, that there is not a country in the world, so far as this document shows, where this work is carried on under the contract system. Every country without exception has a salaried service. Now let me show how they do it. Let us take first England; and I want to say that this statement practically commits itself to the point that to every house in Great Britain, or at least in England, the mail is carried; so that the system is universal. The compensation there for a carrier—and remember this is after fifty years' experience, not an experience, like ours, of three years, a new experience—but after fifty years of continuous experience this is the result of the system as carried on in England.

According to this statement, a carrier without a horse receives a compensation of $234, traveling 15 to 18 miles a day. If he travels 18 to 25 miles day, as he does here, he gets a horse allowance of $208. In addition to that he gets what is called a service pay as the years go on, giving to each carrier a stripe on his arm for certain additional years of service.

The average of that compensation—I do not speak of the highest figures—is $39 a year. He also has an allowance of $5.25 a year for shoes or boots and a uniform allowance, which I have estimated as fairly as possible at $20 a year. He has two weeks of holiday regularly, with his pay continued, which at the compensation received there would equal $9. He has a sick leave, and at the end of his term of service he is pensioned for life.

Now, this compensation, as I have figured it in England, where wages are not as high as in this country, amounts to $515 a year; and he can have sick leave, if his physician certifies to actual sickness, 25 per cent of his time, with continuance of his pay—making $515 a year, with a pension for life at the end of his service.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman tell us how he arrives at that amount of $39?

Mr. HILL. I have figured it item by item.

Mr. LOUD. Is it not $39 salary and the rest expenses?

Mr. HILL. Oh, no; not at all. I am amazed that a document which the gentleman has himself signed and which is issued as a public document to this country should not be understood by the gentleman.

Mr. LOUD. I do not think I ever signed the document.

Mr. HILL. Well, the gentleman's name is here, E. F. LOUD, and it is addressed to the Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

Mr. LOUD. Not that report.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman says he does not think he ever signed the document. It is dated "Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, House of Representatives of the United States, Washington, D. C., January 5, 1898," signed E. F. LOUD, and addressed to the honorable Postmaster-General at Washington. The answer is made from the Office of the Postmaster-General, January 7, 1898, signed James A. Gary, Postmaster-General, and addressed to the Hon. E. F. LOUD, chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. Now, I will pass from England to France.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman wants to be fair?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. LOUD. Of course the chairman of the committee asks the Department for this information, but so far as the furnishing of the information is concerned, it is not true that I furnished the information or that I signed the document containing the information. We asked for the information and it was furnished by the Department.

Mr. HILL. It was transmitted to you, was it not?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes.

Mr. HILL. It was made an official document by the committee, was it not?

Mr. LOUD. That is true, but I did not sign it or make the report.

Mr. HILL. I am reading an official document of the United States Government, for which the gentleman has acknowledged himself to be responsible.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, no; not for the document itself. I have nothing whatever to do with that.

Mr. HILL. I do not think the gentleman questions the facts as submitted by the ambassadors of the United States to these countries.

Mr. LOUD. Permit me to say that I asked for that information. As to the information itself I am not responsible for it, did not gather it, knew nothing about it, and never signed it.

Mr. HILL. Well, for the information which I have given thus far, Mr. Chairman, I will hold the American ambassador at London responsible. He gives it under date of December 15, 1897.

Now I will move across the channel from England to France and will give the information conveyed by the Hon. Horace Porter, United States ambassador to Paris.

Mr. LOUD. I want to say to the gentleman that the information is all right.

Mr. HILL. In France they have had rural free delivery for seventy years, or had had at the time this document was issued. They had 18,300 carriers. They paid originally 7¼ centimes per kilometer for three hundred and sixty-five days in the year. It was a mileage system.

It was not under contract to the lowest bidder at all, but the terms were fixed by the Government, the man selected, and, as I figure it out, his compensation was $198.56 per year on a distance walked of about 10 kilometers. Then they had extra pay for continuous service of $25. They have an allowance for clothing and shoes of $20, and they have a horse allowance where the route is longer than the ordinary distance which a man can walk in a given time. That horse allowance is $80, making a total in that country of $350.

Now, here comes a singular thing in this French report, and I am going to read it verbatim:

Payment by kilometer appears at first sight most equitable. As to the service actually done, this system has been subject to a great deal of adverse criticism and to numerous complaints from those affected by it, especially that it does not take into consideration the length of service or the quality of the work done.

In order to remedy these objections in a manner within the resources at its disposition, the administration has sought in what way it could substitute for the present system a fixed salary, based exclusively on the length of service.

Now, that was a little nearer to the contract system than England comes, because it was a mileage system, and the Government raised the point that it does not take into consideration the quality of the work done:

It has just prepared the following plan, which it was decided would be useful to try in some departments, because of the complexity of the questions which it is necessary to bring up during the periods of transition:

The payment to the postmen of a fixed amount of 600 francs for the beginners, and to old employees a salary going up from 700 francs to 1,100 francs by stages of 50 francs.

The experiment exists at the present time. If it gives the good results expected from it, the system will be extended to other departments as quickly as the appropriations will allow.

So that the very thing that the United States Government proposes to reverse, the French Government, after seventy years of experience, have adopted, namely, a fixed salary. We propose to leave that system and to go on to a contract basis. That is the conclusion of the French Government after seventy years' service.

Now let me take Germany.

Mr. LATIMER. France pays how much?

Mr. HILL. Three hundred and fifty dollars and a pension and some other allowances which I have not had time to figure out carefully. Now, take Germany. In that country the appointed carriers of the rural districts receive a fixed salary of from 700 to 900 marks per annum, and aside from this there is an allowance for rent of about 100 marks, making $238 per year, and then the carrier, as an additional income, receives the delivery rate for all packages of over 2½ kilograms. The delivery is partly on foot and partly by conveyance.

For furnishing the horse the carrier of the rural district receives an amount which corresponds with the cost for procuring the same. The wagon is furnished and kept in order by the postal authorities. After twelve years, if the carrier has given satisfaction in every respect, he is appointed for life. In case of efficiency he is promoted to the position of lower-grade officials, who receive better compensation.

In Austria there is no fixed compensation, but the carrier's wages are subject to agreement between him and the postmaster. The average amount paid to rural carriers by the post-office department is $121.80 per annum. The average daily service is seven hours; the average distance traveled by each carrier, about 10 miles per day. This service is performed on foot.

Take Belgium. The amount paid to the carrier there is $200 to $220. Each carrier travels an average distance on foot of 16 miles per day, and the carriers have fees for postal-bank business carried on by the Government, and they also receive pensions.

In Switzerland they average $234 per year, but now a better scale of wages is being prepared. Clothing is furnished them. All the travel is on foot.

Now, Mr. Chairman, after these years of trial and experience good men have been employed, the service found to be acceptable, and the people want it continued, when suddenly a rejected and repudiated system is to be resurrected. I say rejected and repudiated even as it is to-day. I want to quote from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's report in regard to the star-route system as to 1900 and 1901, page 207:

Last February an examination of the records developed the fact that in the previous five months there had been reported to the Department failures on the part of speculative contractors to perform the service, of such a serious nature as to necessitate the employment of temporary service aggregating 891, on an average of 178 failures per month. The failures during the past year have averaged 220 per month, and in one month alone they were as high as 700. These have resulted in a serious injury to the public service and in an immense amount of work for the Department. We try to have the postmasters fully instructed—

Mr. LATIMER. That is the old contract system.

Mr. HILL. This is last February, a year ago.

We try to have the postmasters fully instructed in advance in regard to the employment of temporary service whenever such failures occur, but it sometimes happens that postmasters either do not understand their duties or are unable to secure a carrier in the emergency and the mails are not carried, or if a carrier can be obtained it is not always practicable to secure one who will run upon the prescribed schedule, and the result is that connections are broken and mails delayed.

The gentleman says that this is the old system. It is as it is to-day.

Mr. LATIMER. I meant to say under the contract system.

Mr. HILL. Gentlemen, I have heard it repeated half a dozen times on this floor that they have got a new system of bidding for star routes. Well, here is a report from one that was bid on under the new system in my district, or the district in which I live. Now, under the new system I say here as a business man that I could take every contract in the Fourth Congressional district under the terms of this bill, which this committee have put in, if I only had the consent of the Postmaster-General, for that stipulation that no one shall take but one contract is entirely abrogated and overruled by the provision for the use of substitutes under terms and regulations prescribed by the Postmaster-General.

I have a letter here which I will read, though it is out of the place where I intended to read it. When I took up this subject I not only investigated it myself, but went to those who knew more about it than I did, and, in my judgment—and I mean no disrespect to this committee in saying so—I think know more about it than they do of the actual working—that is, the postmasters in my district. I wrote to each of them and said to them: "Will you kindly express to me your opinion as to whether it is advisable to conduct the rural free-delivery system as formerly or by a contract system, and give me your reasons for your opinion?"

I received replies from most of them. I received 10 replies from the postmasters of 10 Presidential offices. Nine out of 10 say it would destroy the efficiency of the service. One says—and he gives his reasons for it, and fully as good reasons as I have heard stated to-day, and I will lend the gentlemen of the committee those reasons so that they can make a better argument here. But 9 out of 10 of them conclude that the present system should go. I will read you what this one says as to the star-route contractor having to live on the route:

W. B. Catchings, of Washington, is the real contractor to-day here. He bid in Orrin Oakley's name, and bid so low that he was more than $400 below the lowest local man. He hoped to get some cripple or incompetent to take the route off his hands for less than his bid, and would probably have done so if I had not filled the papers full. * * * I had an intimation—

I will state to the gentleman that this is from two sources in my own district. Now, here is what he says:

I had an intimation when he was here last year that there would be an attempt made to get control of the rurals, and it seems he knew what he was talking about. It will be a great pity if all the scandal of the past must be repeated in this service, and I sincerely hope that it will not become a law.

If it was left for local men, I do not believe that there would be any saving under the contract system. With the professionals coming in I do not doubt but they will cut the price down. There are always plenty of incompetents who can be hired, and presumably they will fix up a nice system of bonds, so that some friend of the poor devil who has a dollar and who is sorry for him will be held up for him. On the one question of money I presume there would be a saving, but they might give up the service and then they could save it all.

There is no possible question but what, under the present system, the service will be incomparably better than it could possibly be under contract, for the discipline which they are under and the requirements of the Post-Office Department which they must fulfill, as compared to the service of a man hired by a contractor because he is cheap, does not seem to need much argument. It just makes a man who is interested in the service, and who hopes to see it attain a high state of perfection, very, very tired.

Now, there are two reasons that have been advanced why this change should be made. One is that we will thereby avoid political control which will be exercised by the army of carriers. I do not believe there is half the danger of political control being exercised by an army of carriers that there is of political control being exercised by a gang, or company, or a large number of favored political contractors. That system is absolutely open under the terms of this bill, and would be utilized in that way.

I believe the Republican party has no right to vote to put this Administration into a position where the lowest bidder must be rejected or where it is possible that the lowest bidder can be rejected and favored political contracts can be issued for 60,000 carriers, as the gentleman from New Jersey says. I think that he is entirely mistaken as to the number, and I will show that he is later. The second reason is that this work could not be done efficiently, and the inequalities of the service be overcome under the salary system. I supposed so, too, until I went into the matter and examined it.

I am going to show you that I think it can be done efficiently. Why? When the matter was up on the deficiency bill a little while ago I made the statement, which my good friend from Chicago called my attention to, that I thought the contract system would be the best thing and the only system under which the work could be done, and I made it to the chairman of the committee, in the smoking room, and he replied to me that the tabulated figures I had presented were not worth the paper upon which they were written; and his statement was that where I had shown that it had cost in Fairfield County $382 to keep two horses and maintain the equipment for a year, the city delivery-wagon service was carried on at a uniform price of $225 all over the United States.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, the gentleman from Connecticut is not exactly fair.

Mr. HILL. Let me say that whether I am fair or not, the gentleman chooses now to contradict that statement because we have reached another stage in the proceedings. I came straight from the lobby, and was called on to make my remarks, and I repeated it then and there, and I said what I am going to read, because I thought it would be better to anticipate him before he made his statement on the floor. I accepted his statement as absolutely correct, for it was made to me in the presence of half a dozen gentlemen, and I came back onto the floor in order to anticipate him, and I made a statement like this:

Now, I know very well that the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads [Mr. LOUD] will reply to what I have said, and will state that all over the United States—

The gentleman even went further than that. He stated that in the city of Bridgeport, in the district where I reside, the United States Government was maintaining under contract a horse service at $225 a year. I will show in a moment that that is not correct—the Government is now employing horses, wagons, and harness under contract, all ready for a Government employee to step on the box in the morning at 7 o'clock and use it during the eight hours of work in the city deliveries and return it at night, and that the whole thing is kept and maintained, feed of the horse, care of the horse, repairs, and depreciation, for $225 a year, and that this showing of mine makes it appear that it costs about $80 to do that thing, leaving but 38 cents a day or $118 a year for the rural free-delivery carrier.

Now, I accepted as Gospel truth what the gentleman from California said, as I have accepted everything that has come from the chairman of the committee for the last seven years; as I was not able to investigate very much at that time, I accepted that statement.

The next day or so the postmaster from Bridgeport happened to be here, and I said to him: "You are employing your delivery-wagon service at $225 a year?" He said, "Oh, no; $300 a year." And then I turned my steps down to the Post-Office Department in order to see if I could acquire any information; and, gentlemen, I have got some accurate information on this subject, and I propose to give it to you. I say now that the best way in which this service can be maintained, in my judgment, is to pay a uniform salary to the men, with a horse allowance adjusted to the varying localities of the country, precisely as it is done in Europe.

Let us see what the horse allowance is. We had a statement that it was uniform all over the United States of $225 a year. The highest place in the United States is in the gentleman's own district of San Francisco, where it is $373.69, within $8 of the figures that I gave two weeks ago, the figures that the gentleman from California said were not worth the paper they were written on.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, the gentleman from Connecticut is mistaken about that.

Mr. HILL. If I am mistaken, the Post-Office Department is mistaken.

Mr. LOUD. Then they are mistaken.

Mr. HILL. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. HILL. May I have a little more time?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield the gentleman ten minutes more.

Mr. HILL. I will try to get through in that time.

I think these figures must be interesting to members of the House, referring as they do to different parts of the United States. Now, I am going to make a suggestion, in reply to the remark of my good friend from Chicago [Mr. BOUTELL], a member of this committee, that nobody has proposed a way in which this thing shall be done.

I say the only fair way is to continue the present system for another year. We have no right to take a new administration of the Post-Office Department, with the Postmaster-General, Mr. Payne, in office for only a few weeks, and dump upon him a system which we know in the beginning is doomed to defeat. The Postmaster-General is one of the best organizers, one of the best executive men in the United States to-day.

Is it not wiser, is it not better, is it not fairer to ourselves and him that we should make this appropriation just as we have done, to be expended in the coming year at his discretion, as it was expended last year in the discretion of his predecessor, and let him, during the year, work out his plans and submit the result to this House of Representatives at our next session? Let him carefully work out this proposition presented here. If he wants to experiment with a contract system, he can do it under the appropriation made. There is no need of any increase in order that he may make experiments.

Let him make whatever experiment he chooses. Let him, so far as the country in general is concerned, go on with the salary system. Let him select a few districts and try there the contract system if he wishes to do so, and let him give us next winter the result of his experiment. My suggestion to the Department would be that it fix a uniform salary. I am not going to undertake to say what it should be. I am not a believer in high salaries in one sense of the word.

I disagree on this point with my friend from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS]. I do not believe it would be wise to pay these men high salaries. I think this service is different from the city carrier service. I would put these employees at the bottom of the classification of the postal service; because, in the first place, they do not render a day's work; the work covers only five or six hours daily at the most. I would place the rural carrier service at the bottom, and from there I would increase the pay accordingly.

I would permit the employees to be promoted from this service to the position of postal clerks and from the position of postal clerks to city carriers and from city carriers to the Railway Mail Service. I would have a uniform civil-service system right straight through, covering the whole country. We have got to come to that. We may put off the day of judgment in this country, but we are getting to be too big a country with too many employees to have these things subject to political control or political patronage.

I do not want such a thing. To induce me to vote for this proposition the promise has been held out to me that if I vote for it I can have the naming of the men in my district who will operate under this contract system. My reply was that that consideration was indeed the strongest argument in favor of voting the other way. I do not know the names of the carriers in my district. I had two appointed there yesterday, and I am informed they are both Democrats. I am glad Democrats are in that service if they are deserving men and will perform the service faithfully.

As I have said, I would have this service carried on under a uniform salary, with an adjusted allowance for horse hire and wagon service according to the country in which the service is to be performed.

Now, let me show how it will affect the districts of various gentlemen here. I will give the allowance paid to-day by the Post-Office Department for 1,479 carriers, scattered all over the United States for wagon, harness, horse, equipment, everything ready for the carrier to enter upon his eight-hour service. I give the amount allowed for a good horse, used every day—not necessarily the same horse every day. This horse may be furnished by the carrier if he wishes to do so. I propose to read the allowance made in all the States of the Union for this character of service.

In Alabama the average is $200; in Arkansas the average is $215.62; in California the average (omitting San Francisco) is $268.58; for San Francisco the average is $373.78, the highest amount anywhere in the United States between the oceans; in Colorado the average is $245; in Connecticut, $269; in Delaware (covering only the city of Wilmington, because this service does not exist anywhere else in that State), $300; in Washington, $300; in Jacksonville, Fla. (the only service in that State being at that city), $250; in Georgia, $206.58; in Illinois (outside of Chicago), $217; in Chicago, $300; in Indiana, $216.60, that includes Indianapolis, where the expense is higher than the average; in Iowa, $216.64; in Kansas, $220; in Kentucky, $241.66; in Louisiana, $178.85; in Maine, $250; in Maryland, $250; in Massachusetts, $280.74; in Michigan (outside of Detroit), $216.66; in Detroit, $300; in Minnesota (outside of Minneapolis and St. Paul), $200; in Minneapolis and St. Paul, $300; in Mississippi, $150; in Missouri (outside of St. Louis), $188.12; in St. Louis, $300; in Montana, $300; in Nebraska, $236; in New Hampshire, $250; in New Jersey, $252.12; New Mexico, $300; New York, $264.94; North Carolina, $183.33; Ohio, $241.35; Oklahoma, $200; Oregon, $225; Pennsylvania, $243.50; Porto Rico, $250; Rhode Island, $312.50; South Carolina, $266.67 (simply because this service exists only in the city of Charleston, and of course the rates are higher in the larger cities); South Dakota, $191.66; Tennessee, $218; Texas, $162.51; Utah, $250; Vermont, $291.66; Virginia, $230; Washington, $262.50; West Virginia, $225, and Wisconsin, $229.67; making a minimum of $150 in Mississippi to a maximum of $373.78 in San Francisco.

Now, gentlemen, I do not believe there has been any corruption in the United States Post-Office Department in paying these various sums for horse-hire allowance in these different communities scattered throughout the United States. I believe that the allowance has been adjusted according to the cost of horses, fixed by the post-office inspectors fairly and equitably, and the Post-Office Committee have at least recognized it by the fact that they have appropriated $650,000 for the coming year in the bill on which we are going to vote this week or next. So I think we are permitted to say that we have at least their tacit approval, if they have investigated the business. I do not know whether they have or not. At any rate, they recommend the appropriation.

So, taking that method, by uniform salaries throughout the United States, and giving the Post-Office Department a year in which to adjust the horse-hire allowance on an equitable basis, according to the portion of the country in which the service is rendered, I believe we can have a rural free-delivery system of which the United States Government will be proud and every voter and every citizen will be proud—just as proud as they are in Europe, where every man has his mail carried to his door.

Now, I heard something about 60,000 carriers. To me that is absurd. We have 17,000 carriers now, with an appropriation of $17,000,000 for city delivery service. We have got about 8,000 carriers in the rural service, and I am informed at the Post-Office Department that the 17,000 city carriers are supplying 35,000,000 people with mail. With 15,000 rural carriers we will supply 20,000,000 people. That takes 55,000,000 people out of our population and leaves the balance in the small towns between the rural delivery and the city delivery. Of course, that is coming, too.

They are not going to conset to go to the post-office and get their mail when they see the mail carried to people living in the city on one side and to the farmers on the farms on the other side of them. It is all coming in. There are 20,000,000 more people to serve. It will take 10,000 more carriers to serve them, I am told, which makes 25,000 rural carriers all told, and at $600 a year or at $700, if you choose, it will cost $15,000,000 to carry on this service.

Now, that is not as much to-day for 45,000,000 people outside of the cities as we were paying for 35,000,000 people inside the cities; and, as a matter of fact, if the convenience and accommodation of the people of the United States was the first thing under consideration, it is easier for the people in the cities to go to the post-office and get their mail than it is for the people in the country, and the man in the country ought to have his mail delivered in preference to the man in the city.

For twenty-five years in business, while living within the limits of a city delivery, I refused to have my business letters delivered to me by carrier, and only allowed letters to my residence to be so delivered. That is the way it is in a city, but the country will take it up, and if you will stand by this appropriation and strike out this contract service we will have a cheaper service under the administration of Henry C. Payne a year from now, and one of which you will be proud, and you will be ashamed of it if you vote to change your system. [Applause.]

Mr. LOUD. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, if I thought that the passage of this bill would in the slightest degree detract from the efficiency of the rural free-delivery service of the country, or would in any way cripple it as an agency for rendering the people in the country happier, more contented, less isolated in their conditions of life, I should not for one moment support it.

No consideration of economy, no consideration of a partisan character would lead me to support it. In that connection I may be allowed to say a few words somewhat personal to myself. I ran for Congress as far back as 1892, upon a platform, self-enunciated in large part, one plank of which was rural free delivery. A great many friends whose confidence in me otherwise was perfect, thought at that time—the subject being so entirely new to them and I running against a Populist—that I must be just throwing out "something better" than the "subtreasury," in order to overturn the Populist, to out-Herod and out-bid him.

I tried to explain to the people at home how the system could possibly be inaugurated, and how it was not a dream, but could become actual and a part of the permanent post-office system of the United States. After I came to Washington there was an appropriation. It was not secured by me, although the first rough draft of the resolution was drawn by me and I voted for it to try the experiment. Under Mr. Cleveland's Administration, in the beginning of his second term, the Postmaster-General, Mr. Bissell, and the President were both very much opposed to trying the experiment, so much so that they did not try it. It was subsequently made mandatory, and even then it was not tried.

When Mr. Wilson was made Postmaster-General, one day at the Post-Office Department—he having sent for me—he said he wanted to talk to me about this "free-delivery craze," as it was called. He said that the President thought it was merely a scheme to "farm the farmer," and he said, "Williams, I would like to know what you think. Don't you think that there is a great deal of demagogy and politics in it?" I said, "Undoubtedly there is. There are a great many people who are advocating it simply because they think that it will catch votes; but, Mr. Wilson, the thing is practical, because a thing which has been done can be done again. I have seen the system in operation elsewhere and it can be operated here. Not only that, but down in the swamp country of Mississippi, where the distances between residences are enormous, where the plantation receives the mail for everybody upon it, I have seen a system developed which consists in this, that the carrier has a key to a box at the plantation door, the plantation manager or proprietor has another key, and orders are given by the planters to the postmaster to deliver all their mail, except money mail, to the star-route carrier, and the carrier is specially paid by the planters a certain amount of money per month, and he receives the mail and puts it in the plantation box and takes out such mail as has been put in the plantation box in the meantime."

Mr. Wilson asked me if I would go home and write him a letter. I wrote him a long letter, which I presume is on file in the Post-Office Department now, telling him how I thought the system could be inaugurated. It was inaugurated upon a better system than the one suggested by me. My system was crude in comparison with the one which is in operation now, which is better in every respect.

I have mentioned this not in the line in which things are so often mentioned, of pretending to be the father of something that is of benefit to the public, but to show, if I can, to the minds of the members here present, that if I thought any legislation upon this subject would affect its efficiency, I for one would not support that legislation no matter what other considerations might lead me to incline toward it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think there ought to be any heat about this discussion. I can not account for heat being infused into this discussion except upon the principle that some gentlemen must have some patronage interests behind the bill which are, in their opinion, affected; because I can not see otherwise how a man could become personally heated by a discussion of a mere business proposition.

I shall advocate this bill because I think that if it is passed this service will go on with equal efficiency or more efficiency; because I think it will be more economical; because I think it will be less partisan. I shall advocate it as an American, believing in a cheaper and better service. I shall advocate it as a Democrat, because I believe that the present system can be used, and possibly has been used, although of that I am not certain—but I am certain that it can be used if anybody chooses to use it—for partisan and political purposes.

I am certain that the opportunity and temptation so to use it exists even now under this curious "civil-service" system of appointment of carriers inaugurated since the 1st of February. This I shall demonstrate later on.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the efficiency. I say, notwithstanding the criticisms that have been made on the star-route contract service of this country, that it has been the most economically administered and, in proportion to its magnitude and cost, the most efficient agency of this Government almost from the beginning down to now. Certainly, after the early star-route scandals were brought to light and the repetition of them was prevented by legislation, I have never heard any objection to the star-route contract system except the objections growing out of the fact that a great number of routes could be bid in by one person, an absentee, or by a syndicate or corporation and farmed out to ignorant people as subcontractors; and every member of Congress knows how that is done.

Some great company would bid in thousands of routes, and then they would send a shrewd agent among the people, who would go around until he found some simple and ignorant man who would be simple enough to take the route at less than it would cost him to carry the mail. From that there was cause of complaint. Subcontractors would fail to draw up the contracts properly or fail to put them in writing, and to forward them to Washington, where they could be filed for their protection and thereby the subcontractor would frequently lose their pay.

But that has been corrected in connection with the star routes, Mr. Chairman, and its possibility has been prevented in this bill, thoroughly and absolutely, with regard to the contracts which will grow up here. Corrected how? Why, in the first place, it is provided in this bill that nobody shall be a contractor for any route unless he lives on the route district.

In the second place it is provided that nobody shall have but one route, and must himself, in person, do the work. When we follow these provisions up a little further we appreciate their import; we know that when a man lives in the route district he has upon him all at once the eyes of that community for whom he carries the mail. They are all acquainted with him, they are acquainted with his father, with his mother, with his sister, and with his entire family, his environments, and know all about his associations, so that if he is an unfit man to carry the mails, from moral or business inaptitude or mentally, these people will be able to know it and, knowing it, will make their knowledge known here.

Under the old system one man could make many contracts, while, of course, the people living along the routes where the mails were carried from one post-office to the other knew nothing about the character of the contractor, and it was not necessary that anything should be known about the character of the subcontractor except that he was physically able to carry the mail, or had a horse and wagon that could carry it.

Some gentleman said that a great many of the contractors down South were negroes. I have never known of any negro who was a contractor on a mail route, but I have known of many cases where poor, simple, illiterate negroes, easily imposed upon by the persuasion of some shrewd route agent, were subcontractors to carry the mail, and I myself have tried to help a good many of them to get their pay since I have been in Washington—pay out of which they were cheated and swindled by the great syndicates that had taken these routes. That has been amended as to the star-route system, and that possibility is provided against in this bill.

Now, gentlemen, I said that this was a business matter. We do not propose that the rural free-delivery system shall stop. Why, to listen to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] this morning, and to listen to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] yesterday, you would imagine absolutely that if we admitted the mail to be taken out of a box and put into a box upon rural free-delivery route by people employed by contract, instead of the people employed on salaries, that all the boys and girls of the country would get up in about a week's time and live in New York, because contract-employed carriers were going to destroy the possibility of the inhabitant of the country districts maintaining their communication with civilization, and keeping their eyes upon the march and progress of human events in the country in which they existed.

I have no doubt the greatest curse of country life is isolation, and that will be relieved to a great extent by rural free delivery that gives to the countryman, his wife, and daughter his daily paper, his weekly illustrated paper, his monthly magazine, his price list, his market report, his weather report at his gate, rather than have him to take a horse and a man out of the crop and send from 3 to 6 miles to get the mail, especially as having that to do he will send only one or two days in the week, even if the mail is delivered at the office every day. I maintain that there is not a scintilla of force in the argument that because the mail is carried by contract therefore the service will be destroyed. There is no reason, in my mind, to believe that it will be even crippled or its efficiency will be in the slightest degree lessened.

Now, how about the second point? Will it be more or less economical? I say it will be more economical, for several reasons. In the first place, because every member of Congress knows that here lately people have begun to learn that any man can get a job at $500 or $600 a year by instituting a free-delivery route, being naturally selected as carrier. Therefore we find that men think that all they have to do is to go to work with kinspeople and neighbors to get up a petition for a route, and that, too, in many cases, where a route ought not to be.

If you adopt this other system, then there will be left the only motive that ought to exist, namely, the public motive of getting needed service for the people living along the line. Wherever the business is sufficient they will still get up the petitions and still the routes will be established, and if it is not needed, then it will not be solicited nor established, so that the system will come gradually, and in proportion as it comes gradually it can be better administered.

Now, then, further as to the question of economy. It will be more economical, for this reason: Because the service can be adjusted to the standard of wages of the locality in which the service is performed. Now, if you will take certain districts of my own State, a man can carry the mail on a mail route there on a sandy road better in wet weather than in dry weather, in a country where all the necessaries of life are very cheap, where nature herself almost feeds the people, and where she furnishes the fuel nearly all the year, and where everything is cheaper by nearly 50 per cent than exactly the same service could be conducted in the new State of Washington, let us say, and still leave the carrier exactly the same profit.

Now, one of my colleagues from the South says that that was one of his objections to this very system, that our people carrying the mail in certain parts of our country would be paid less than those in the Northwest or on the Pacific slope or west among the Rocky Mountains. If our man makes the same profit, that is all he cares about or, at any rate, ought to demand. Gentlemen, we do not represent the carriers alone; we represent the people of the United States who pay the taxes into the United States Treasury.

And, by the way, Mr. Chairman, I have no patience with these toplofty airs of millionairedom with which men cry, "Cheap, cheap, cheap!" and deride cheapness when they are referring to the cheapness which keeps money in the people's pockets, and very often they are the very first people to be "cheap" when they can thereby keep money in their own pockets. [Laughter and applause]. It is the duty of a Representative to save money for the people; it is his duty, of course, to have an efficient service, but it is equally his duty to have that efficient service at the lowest possible cost to the people who pay for it.

A Representative ought never to be generous. He can not be generous, because a man can not be generous with that which is not his own. The duty of a Representative is to be just. He does not occupy the position which I do in my private business, when I may give a man $20 if I feel like it, or when a contractor has done work well for me I may add 20 per cent as a gratuity of appreciation for the efficiency of his service. The Representative stands rather in the attitude of an administrator or a guardian, and he ought to hold himself down to the bare legalities—doing the best he can for his ward and estate.

Now, then, I say that this mail in a great part of the country, in nearly all parts of the country, can be carried cheaper under the contract system than it is now being carried under the salaried system. The fact that men eagerly sought and competed for the places at $400 and $500 and now get $600 proves that. I go further than that, however, and say this, that if any gentleman differs with me upon that proposition, here is a position about which he can not differ with me, namely, that it can be carried cheaper under the contract system than it will ultimately be carried under the salaried system, for the annual salary is certain to be annually increased for many years. Then I come to the consideration of our attitude toward the question as politicians and as Representatives upon this floor, most of us desiring to continue to be Representatives.

Gentlemen, if this system is perfected there will be in the United States, according to my rough and crude calculation, somewhere between 70,000 and 100,000 mail routes, and these men will be my constituents and your constituents, and we will have upon an average from 10 to 15 of them in every county in the United States—down in my part of the country, at least—and more than that in the larger counties, and more than that in the more thickly settled countries, because where the population is denser the routes will have to be shorter in order to serve the clientele along them.

Do you imagine for one minute when these gentlemen come up and say $500 is not sufficient, $600 is what they want, and when the House of Representatives votes $600 is what they need and ought to have, that this is an isolated case? Do you imagine that when they come back next year and say $700 is what they want, you are not going to vote that $700 is what they need and ought to have?

Do you not know, gentlemen, that they will go on, and do you not know that they ought to go on, until equality has been established between the pay given to them in the country and the pay to the city carriers in the cities? Do you not know that when they both get together and want more at the end of that time they are going to get it? The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] said the other day that there was not a member of this House strong enough when the system grows to a perfect condition to stand up against these men, saying, impliedly, whether they say it expressly or not, "We demand a larger salary; and if you do not vote it, you must get out."

I think he is right. I have a further objection to that contingency, and that is that when the Representative addressed in this manner is a demagogue, when he is a man who makes politics his living, is a professional politician, when he is willing to sacrifice everything to remain in power, that man will surrender. And when he happens to be a gentleman, when he happens to think there is a duty due from him to the people and to the public Treasury—and a great many Representatives are that way—then that Representative will go by the board, so that we will have a process of natural selection of the unfit in these halls. That will take place in the march of events, and not the natural selection of the fit.

Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. I want to say that I am in accord with my friend on the question of economy. But why should we begin with the rural carriers? Why not begin with the postal clerks in the city delivery also?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, that is a question which I can not answer except by simply saying that this is the opportunity to begin. If the gentlemen of the House will furnish me an opportunity to begin on anybody else, speaking for myself, I will begin; but when a little girl is told not to eat any candy that day, because candy injures her health, and has frequently been told that too many sweet potatoes would injure her health, and the box of confectionery is before her, and she asks her mother why not begin on the sweet potatoes which are absent, instead of the candy which is present, the mother is apt to reply: "Never mind discussing the sweet potatoes, child; the candy is here. Let us talk about that." [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. I should be glad to have the gentleman state his objections to the continuation of the present system.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am going to do that—I have been trying to do it to some extent. When I say that the proposed system would be, in my mind, more economical and less partisan than the existing system, I thereby, to some extent, express my objection to the existing system, namely, that it furnishes too much opportunity for partisan manipulation, and that it costs too much and will ultimately, when it becomes universal, cost a great deal too much. It will cost somewhere between $70,000,000 and $90,000,000 a year. I think it ought to cost a great deal less.

Now, I want to go on with the line of my remarks. A friend of mine on the Democratic side, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], criticised this bill because of the discretion which it leaves with the Postmaster-General. I want to read what the bill proposes, and then I want to read the existing regulations, and I shall seek to establish the fact that the opportunity for partisan and political administration under the present rules and regulations, ever since the 1st of February and now, is ten times greater than it could possibly be under this bill.

In this connection I wish to say in the very first place—and this is partially in answer to the gentleman from Kansas—I want to say that I have never heard it even urged or claimed—not even alleged, much less proven—that the star-route contract system was ever attempted to be used for political purposes. Yet under that system there is, and there must be, in all cases a discretion left with somebody—in that case with the Postmaster-General—because the contractor must furnish "a sufficient guaranty"—I believe that is the exact language of the law—"sufficient guaranties of his ability to perform the duty."

Of course the Postmaster-General is to be the ultimate judge of that; he has that discretion; and if he dared, he might use that discretion in such a way as to violate the spirit of the law in order that political benefits might accrue. But the difference is this: He is at the head of a great Department.

He may be a bitter partisan, he may be altogether unscrupulous, but he is in a position where he has a certain degree of pride; he dares not expose himself in such a way that a mere child can prove an obvious, plain, palpable dereliction of duty and neglect of the spirit of the law. But when you come to some little four-penny underling, protected from you and me and from effective criticism by his obscurity and his irresponsibility—anxious to stay in place by pleasing, not you or me or the country, but the "powers that be," that are just above him—he can afford to violate the spirit of the law for the purpose of accomplishing partisan aims.

Now I want to read one paragraph of this bill, because it is the soul of the bill. There is nothing else in it of importance except paragraph 4, which was put in for the purpose of persuading gentleman who have hedged themselves in with a line of skirmishers for the purpose of renomination or reelection that their line of skirmishers will remain. That is what the fourth paragraph on page 3 of the bill means—that the men now in shall stay in.

But let me refer to the proviso at the end of the first paragraph—the soul of this bill—on page 3:

Provided, That no person shall be awarded a contract for more than one route under this paragraph.

Yesterday the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], when interrupting the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], said, if I understood him, that there were "snakes" in this proviso, because it did not use the language "under this bill" instead of the words "under this paragraph." Now, I take it for granted that the friends of this bill are perfectly willing to strike out the word "paragraph" and insert the word "bill" if any gentleman desires it. But the gentleman from Connecticut wanted to know why the word "paragraph" had been inserted.

That question is easily answered, because the paragraph to which that proviso is attached is the only paragraph in the bill which has anything to do with the contract system. Now, let me read the whole paragraph:

First. That before any person shall be designated to carry the mail on any mail rural free-delivery route, the Postmaster-General shall cause an advertisement to be posted for not less than ten days, in a conspicuous place accessible to the public, in the post-office from which the mail is to be carried, inviting proposals, in such form as he may prescribe, for the service to be performed.

The service shall be awarded to the lowest bidder—

Some gentlemen argue that if you give it to the lowest bidder you give it to the worst bidder necessarily; that he is the least efficient, and that he is "cheap, cheap, cheap." Oh, what a horror we have of cheapness when it is somebody's else money we are spending. Then this language follows:

who shall furnish evidence to the Postmaster-General that such bidder is—

Several things which I will read in a moment. Other gentlemen take that up and they say, "If it was the lowest bidder, and if it stopped there, your bill might be all right;" but it goes on to say that you shall furnish evidence of certain things "satisfactory to the Postmaster-General," and therefore it gives him a discretion to be partisan and unfair in what he is doing. It gives him discretion to determine what things? Are they improper things, are they wrong things, are they unnecessary things? Not a whit of it. Let me read them.

First:

That such competitor is a legal and actual resident of the district or territory in which the proposed service is performed.

Why, do you suppose that the most unscrupulous ward heeler that ever accidentally mounted to a Cabinet position would dare while there rule, for partisan purposes, in the face of a neighborhood who knew the person, that a man was not a resident when he was, or was a resident when he was not?

Second:

That he is a reliable and trustworthy person, of good, moral character.

Well, he ought to be that, and somebody ought to determine it. Somebody has got to determine it, because this man is brought into business relations with the people in the community. Who would you rather have determine it, the Postmaster-General, who is not mixed up in local bickerings, not protected by his obscurity and irresponsibility from criticism, or some little post-route inspector, who is protected by obscurity and who is frequently affected by local considerations?

Third:

Able to read and write.

Well, he must be able to read and write to be of any service.

Fourth:

And having sufficient intelligence properly to perform the service.

And fifth:

Who shall tender sufficient guaranties that he will personally perform acceptable service.

That last and fifth condition is the language of the Revised Statutes in connection with star-route contracts, and it has never been abused in letting them out, and I take it for granted this will not be.

Ah, but the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] said yesterday that these people under this bill could make an agreement to carry this mail for a year, and then "when the inclement weather of the winter and the bad roads came on they could 'lay down,'" as he expressed it, and somebody else must be employed by the Government as a substitute at a higher salary for the winter months, and then those who had done the "laying down" would come back the next summer and take it up again at the annual pay for the summer months.

One objection to that is that it supposes that the other party to the contract—the Postmaster-General—is a miserable fool, an amazing idiot, to let it be done. The second objection to it is that there is not a line in the bill and nothing in the system, and, furthermore, nothing in existing law, that justifies the assertion that when a man has taken a contract to carry mail for a year or for any other stated period of time to be prescribed by the Postmaster-General, and has given bond to do his work, that he could "lay down" on the contract, as they call it, and not leave his bondsman responsible upon the bond for his dereliction and nonfeasance of duty under the contract.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I have some few things that I would rather say before I sit down.

Mr. LOUD. I yield to the gentleman ten minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for ten minutes additional.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to state to the gentleman that my assertion that on thirty days' notice the Government could dispense with the services of the contractor, and that the contractor could give thirty days' notice to the Government, was embodied in the report of the chairman of this committee [Mr. LOUD], who stated that that could be done to get rid of its being a perpetual contract. Now, the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] was the father of this bill, and I thought he knew something about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to accept the statement of the gentleman from Virginia and do accept it, but that does not change my proposition. It merely shifts the error one degree further removed. It seems now from what he has said that this error was that of the gentleman from California and not that of the gentleman from Virginia. I say that there is not in this bill one line or precept and that there is not in the Revised Statutes—that is, in the present existing law—one line or precept which enables that to be done, and I do not care who made the mistake, whether it was the gentleman from California or the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. Now will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, yes.

Mr. SWANSON. You are driven to this conclusion, either that there must be an indefinite contract, with a limit of time that the contractor must execute, or that the Government or the contractor must have the right to get rid of it. Now, which position do you advocate?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If I could be driven to an alternative between two absurdities by the willingness of the gentleman from Virginia to drive me, I would find myself there, no doubt; but I am driven by neither.

Mr. SWANSON. The absurdity is in the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The absurdity is not in the bill. The bill provides that—

Before any person shall be designated to carry any mail on any mail rural free-delivery route the Postmaster-General shall cause an advertisement to be posted for not less than ten days—

And so forth—

in such form as he may prescribe, inviting proposals for the service to be performed.

Of course the time is a part of "the service to be performed," and would be in the advertisement and would be in the contract. It is simply absurd to say——

Mr. SWANSON. Wait a moment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But let me get through with my answer.

Mr. SWANSON. I yielded courteously to the gentleman yesterday.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will yield if you will wait till I get through with my answer.

Mr. SWANSON. I will wait.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, Now, it is absurd to say that I am driven to the conclusion that the time must be "indefinite." What I am driven to is only this, that the term to be fixed is in the discretion of the Post-Office Department. That they may make contracts for one year, and that they may make contracts for six months, and that they may make contracts for three months is undoubtedly true; but that they could make a contract for an indefinite period, or that they would have to make a contract for an indefinite period is an absurdity.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. You have been speaking about the partisanship of this bill, the partisan way in which it has been executed by the Post-Office Department.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; that it is alleged to have been executed. I have no knowledge of my own that it has been so executed.

Mr. SWANSON. Well, now, as I understand, you are willing to give the Postmaster-General power, and he has power, to make a contract for thirty days, ten days, five days, one day, two years, five years, or twenty years, as he sees proper.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. He can not, I suppose, make a contract for more than a year, because he can not exceed the time for the appropriation; but, go ahead.

Mr. SWANSON. Then for one year, and you change carriers every year. Now, you think the Democrats are getting rid of partisanship—getting rid of the power of the Postmaster-General for partisan purposes—when you consent to a bill that would give him the right to enter into a contract for five days, where a Democrat contracted, at any time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, it seems I have to be very extended in my remarks to be understood. While the Postmaster-General can give out a contract for three months or for six months or for a year, he can also give out a contract for a year, to be continued longer under certain conditions—that is, to go into operation for another year if mutually satisfactory.

In other words, I take it for granted that the Post-Office Department will give its contracts here just as it does under the star-route system, and I am perfectly willing to trust the Post-Office Department to fix the time during which the contract can run. In fact, I would rather do that than to undertake to fix it myself, as a minority in a body consisting of a majority of the other party, or to make them perpetual under even a genuine civil-service law, much less under this transparent counterfeit of civil service under which the system is now being operated.

Mr. SWANSON. Under star routes they have the lettings for four years.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If they do, they can do it under this system, and they can still do it, because there is no limitation upon the time; but that is a totally different thing from saying that the contract must be indefinite.

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman will permit me, I took the trouble to go to the Post-Office Department and see the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who has charge of the contract system, and asked his explanation of the language of this bill. I may have been mistaken, but the impression that I received in the interview with him upon this subject was that the provision of this bill implied a contract without any limitation, continuing at will, but terminable at the option of either party on thirty days' notice.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. On the termination of the first period.

Mr. HILL. Terminable at the option of either party at the end of thirty days' notice, but continuing, by consent of both parties, without limit.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I think certainly the gentleman must have been mistaken if he means that the first period prescribed in the contract did not have to be terminated.

Mr. HILL. That is the impression I received in that interview.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Undoubtedly that would be a most absurd policy, Mr. Chairman, to have such a system of contracts carried out by the Government. I do not think that there could be such a system. There is a difference in these contracts and those of the star routes, to some extent, and it would require the Postmaster-General to be more definite than that for rural free delivery, or we would have a very foolish system.

I take it that a Republican Postmaster-General or any Postmaster-General would have common sense, and that he would not do such a simple thing as to draw up a contract which would enable the contractor to get paid on an annual average and then throw up the contract during the bad part of the year, without responsibility on his bond, and resume it again at the annual rate during the summer period of good roads. I hope he is not afflicted with such "midsummer madness." We have been told what the discretion of the Postmaster-General was under this bill. What is the discretion vested in underlings under the present system as now operated?

Gentlemen, to this I want your careful attention—and I ask especially the careful attention of gentlemen on this side of the House, and I ask especially that candid, fair, and conservative consideration, for which the gentleman from Virginia is celebrated—to the breadth of discretion under this system, and to the character of the people in whom it is vested.

It says "when the route inspector is advised of a vacancy" advertisements shall be issued, and that he shall receive the names of persons desiring to enter the examination; and in the next clause it states that the route inspector is in his capacity a representative of the commission. In the next clause he is to examine as to the ability of applicants to do the work, and then—I read from the "Instructions to route inspectors relating to the examination of applicants for the position of rural letter carriers." The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] gave me this. He quoted very briefly and very select parts of it yesterday.

4. Each applicant will be given a blank application, which he will fill out with pen and ink in the presence of the route inspector.

5. Each applicant, separate and apart from the other applicants, will be required to read twenty-five addressed envelopes or cards. The route inspector will carefully note every error made by the applicant and the time he takes in the test.

6. Each applicant will be required to fill out a blank registry receipt and a blank receipt for money for the purchase of a money order.

Then, mind you, after that examination had taken place the natural conclusion would be that the man who did the best upon a competitive examination would have the route. Oh, no; the so-called examination is nothing but the preamble to the "instructions." I will not read all that follows. I will read this, the eighth clause:

8. Applications of persons under 17 or over 55 years of age will not be considered, except in cases of honorably discharged United States soldiers and sailors of the civil war or of the Spanish-American war—who are physically able to perform the service.

Does it stop there? No—

Who is to determine this physical ability? We will find out a little later that there is a little "discretion" in this system.

"Physically able to perform the service." If the agent did not like the shade of my politics he might say that I did not look like I was strong enough, and he might deny me the position, and he might say that my friend from Missouri, Mr. CHAMP CLARK, was a bigger man, and he liked his shade of politics better, and he would be given the route, because he was right physically as well as the right color in politics.

Next, the applicant would be required, under the ninth clause, to show that he possesses "the necessary equipment for the service," namely, a suitable horse and wagon or cart. Route inspectors are to be the judges of whether the horse or cart is suitable. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] said some things the other day that were intended to be comical and funny; and they were; but they had a great deal of sense in them. I tell you when it comes to a civil-service examination for rural free-delivery carriers it is much more important to examine the horse than it is the man, because almost any sort of a man will do, but it takes a pretty good horse. [Laughter.]

Now, it goes on and states that a man can not be appointed if he has not the "necessary equipment" unless he "can satisfy the inspector." It was this word "satisfy" or "satisfaction" in connection with the Postmaster-General's "can satisfy the inspector" which so disquieted the gentleman from Virginia. He might be the tool of a party or the tool of a neighborhood, or he might want to punish one Congressman for not being in accord with the bureau's ideas or reward another because he is; but unless the applicant can satisfy the route inspector that he will be able to furnish this equipment—having it not—he will not receive the appointment. Don't you understand? Here is a breadth of "discretion," which he might use in a partisan way.

Understand, I do not say that he necessarily would, but I say on a proposition of that sort that the probability of that sort of a man with that sort of discretion abusing it would be infinitely greater than the probability of the Postmaster-General abusing the discretion which is left to him in this language of the pending bill: "The service shall be awarded to the lowest bidder who shall furnish evidence satisfactory to the Postmaster-General," etc.

But let me go on. In the twelfth clause it says:

After an examination has been held the route inspector—

Now, mark you—will carefully observe the general characteristics of the candidates or applicants—

Great heavens! A man may have a prejudice against red hair because it shows Irish blood and a lack of republican principles, for all I know. [Laughter.] "Taking special notice of health and physical conditions." An expert physician he must be if he knows how to do it well! And—in submitting his report state which one in his judgment should be selected.

Think of that! Which one should, in his judgment, be selected. Is it any wonder that in the Kentucky district, referred to by Mr. GILBERT, 10 Democratic applicants were not appointed and all 5 of the Republican applicants were appointed? I suppose they all passed the examination, although I believe they did not hold an examination in that particular case. I do not want to be incorrect about it.

Suppose they had held over. Suppose my friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] was there, one of the most lovable men in the world, but one of the most violent partisans, and suppose ten Democrats had passed the examination and five Republicans, and there were four places to fill, I will bet this year's hat against my last decennial's socks that my friend from Indiana would have put in the Republicans. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. And how would it be with my friend the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am afraid that I would have put in five of the Democrats. [Renewed laughter.] And then, by way of a stump speech in the belly of the thing, we have this clause—after giving all this power and discretion to the inspector they put this in to satisfy the high-minded and the fair-minded:

Under no circumstances must political or religious affiliations of applicants be considered, nor must political indorsements be received or entertained.

[Laughter.]

No wonder the gentleman from California tells us that he has been told by members of the House when he has assured them that their patronage would be lost, that they could not get any more hereafter under the civil service, "Oh, yes; they could; they were promised," and I reckon maybe they thought they could get more. No reason why they should not under these "instructions." It may be that they were mistaken. I am willing to suppose that they are; but at any rate they are looking for it, in spite of this stump speech, in the belly of the "instructions."

Now, here is another one, clause 13:

In recommending a selection from among the applicants who were able to fill out the necessary blanks, route inspectors will give preference to those who by long and constant residence in the community are well acquainted with the patrons of the route, hold their confidence, possess the necessary equipment, and are prepared in cases of emergency to furnish a suitable substitute.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL], the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], and I are all three residents, but this little inspector down there, protected by his obscurity, has the right to pass upon which one of us excels the other in our degree of residency. Oh, my friend from Virginia, talk about discretion in the Postmaster-General! Here is a discretion lodged in a little post-office inspector, to state which one of several fellows he thinks excels the other in degree of residency; and, moreover, more indefinite still, which one best, or most nearly, "holds the confidence of the patrons of the route." [Laughter.]

If you want to get at popularity of the applicants, why not get it in another way? Why not prepare the way by providing that the names of the residents along the route should be taken down and that they should meet and determine as to the popularity of the candidates? They are the proper parties to determine who shares their "confidence." It is not a post-office inspector.

He could not hurt me in my district, and he could not hurt you in your district, by building up a Republican machine against us, because they could not find anybody down there to build up with, and these people are not trying to do foolish things; but I imagine that if they got into a close Congressional district like the district of my friend from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS], or got to "monkeying with the buzz saw" in the district of my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], they might find it possible to adjudge that their friends did not "hold the confidence of the patrons" of the routes, and that furthermore they were not fitted by the longest and most constant residence to attend to the thing.

Possess the necessary equipment and are prepared in cases of emergency to furnish a suitable substitute.

My heavens! This officer is not only to determine whether the candidate most nearly possesses "the confidence of the persons on the route," whether he properly comes up in physical "characteristics," and in moral character, and in everything else, but whether he is most fitted to select a substitute. [Laughter.]

Now, my friends, this is a business proposition; let us talk about it as such. I would never have gone into this question but for the fact that other gentlemen have tried to make so much out of it. I really do not think it is necessary to assume that this discretion is going to be very much misused either way by the Postmaster-General, certainly not; but I do think, and I believe every fair-minded man will agree with me, that this discretion is much more apt to be misused by a department underling than by department chief, who has his reputation to keep up.

Reputation is a great thing. You all remember the Confederate soldier at Chickamauga whom my friend from Missouri told about, who, while a battle was progressing, saw one of these hedge-row rabbits running as fast as she could. With a look of envy, the man straightened himself up, bared his breast once more to the bullets, made a man of himself, and said, "Run! Mollie Cotton-tail; if I had no more reputation to save than you, I would run, too." [Laughter.] Many a man is honest because he is in such a high position that the light is upon him—that all men see him—and he has too much pride in his character or reputation or position to do a thing which, perhaps, if he were in a more obscure position, he might do.

My Republican friends, when I speak of the capability of the present Administration to be used as a partisan machine I am afraid that with some of you I may be hurting the bill of the gentleman from California, which I am undertaking to advocate. But I am speaking to you as fair-minded men, because it is possible, although in your opinion not very probable, that in the not remote future we may be in control of the destinies of the Union and we may be running this machine. Frankly, I have no more confidence—not a particle more—in the impartiality and the non-partisanship of a post-office inspector under a Democratic Administration than I would have in such an officer under a Republican Administration.

I say it is better for the service to have the contract system. It is better for the service, because there will be equal if not greater efficiency. I believe the efficiency will be greater, and I will tell you why, because at present the men who are carriers are in their positions by reason of political influence, and if any of them does not do his work in the right way and is about to be "bounced" the Department knows that should he be bounced there will be by morning at least one Representative and two Senators down upon the backs of the Department officials trying to get the man back.

But if he is a contractor, if he has just given bond for the faithful performance of the work, he is nobody's man particularly. He has not any political "pull." He can not badger and worry the life out of the Department official in order to be kept in whether he be inefficient or not. Hence I say the service will be even more efficient. I say, also, it will be more economical. I have told why. It will be less partisan. The opportunities of partisanship will be lessened.

The system here proposed will be better for the service, and I say it will be better for you and me in the future, because we do not want to build up this immense army of salaried officials to worry us by importunities into doing one of two things—either refusing that which we would gladly grant as far as the parties themselves, our friends, and neighbors are concerned, or, on the other hand, doing that which we ought not, as sworn representatives of the American people, to do; that is, casting our votes and our influence to secure a salary greater than the service itself calls for.

I append to my remarks the document to which I have referred.

INSTRUCTIONS TO ROUTE INSPECTORS RELATING TO THE EXAMINATION OF APPLICANTS FOR THE POSITION OF RURAL LETTER CARRIER.

On February 1, 1902, the order of the President classifying rural letter carriers will become effective. After that day vacancies occurring in the force of carriers will be filled in accordance with rules of the Civil Service Commission.

The following special rules are prepared for the guidance of route inspectors, who will be detailed to conduct examinations where vacancies exist:

1. A letter carrier who resigns will not be permitted to discontinue service until his successor is appointed and qualifies.

2. In the case of the death or removal of carriers postmasters will be instructed to employ the substitute carrier, and if there is none, any suitable person, until the regular examination can be held.

3. When the route inspector is advised of a vacancy by the Department, he will proceed to the post-office as quickly as possible, notifying the postmaster by wire, if necessary, of the day he will reach there, and instructing him to notify applicants to be on hand to take the prescribed examination.

4. Each applicant will be given a blank application, which he will fill out with pen and ink in the presence of the route inspector.

5. Each applicant, separate and apart from the other applicants, will be required to read 25 addressed envelopes or cards. The route inspector will carefully note every error made by the applicant and the time he takes in the test.

6. Each applicant will be required to fill out a blank registry receipt and a blank receipt for money for the purchase of a money order.

7. Applications of badly crippled or deformed persons will not be considered. This will include persons who are totally deaf or blind, who have one arm or one leg, etc.

8. Applications of persons under 17 or over 55 years of age will not be considered, except in the case of honorably-discharged soldiers or sailors of the civil war or Spanish war who are physically able to perform service.

9. Applications of persons will not be considered who have not the necessary equipment for the service—namely, horse and wagon or cart—unless applicant can satisfy the route inspector that he will be able to supply such equipment in case he receives the appointment.

10. The applications of women will be received, but a woman should not be recommended for appointment as regular carrier unless, in the judgment of the route inspector, local conditions and circumstances are such as to make the recommendation desirable and for the best interests of the service.

11. Applicants must reside directly on or within the territory to be supplied by the route where the vacancy exists.

12. After an examination has been held the route inspector will carefully observe the general characteristics of the candidates or applicants, taking special notice of health and physical conditions, and in submitting his report state which, in his judgment, should be selected. Under no circumstances must political or religious affiliations of applicants be considered, nor must political indorsements be received or entertained. The merit of the applicant and the good of the service alone must be considered in submitting a recommendation.

13. In recommending a selection from among the applicants who were able to fill out the necessary blanks, route inspectors will give preference to those who, by long and constant residence in the community, are well acquainted with the patrons of the route, hold their confidence, possess the necessary equipment, and are prepared in cases of an emergency to furnish a suitable substitute.

NOTE.—Section 1754, Revised Statutes: Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall be preferred for appointment to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices.

14. In filling a vacancy the substitute carrier, competing in the examination with other applicants, everything else being equal, should be given preference.

15. When a route inspector has doubts about an applicant's character or reputation, he should not only make inquiry of two or three persons given as references in the application, but also consult two or more prominent citizens not mentioned by the applicant.

16. A rural letter carrier will be required to furnish a suitable substitute who will be required to give bond in the same amount as the carrier—namely, $500. With the separation of the regular carrier from the service the substitute also will be dropped, but will be permitted to take the examination in competition with other applicants for the position if he can meet the requirements of rules 7, 8, 9, and 11.

The central board of examiners will carefully review all recommendations for the selection of carriers in connection with the applications and written and card-reading tests submitted therewith. Route inspectors must therefore bear in mind that their recommendations will not necessarily control; they are, however, desired by the central board of examiners as a guide or aid in its consideration of the examination papers.

General Superintendent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

HALL OF RECORDS.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, I present a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, and ask that it be printed as a Senate document. It is with reference to the construction of a hall of records in the District of Columbia. The letter of the Secretary goes into the history of efforts made for the construction of such a building, and shows the urgent necessity of it.

I have heretofore on one or two occasions directed the attention of the Senate to this very important matter. I know nothing connected with the public service that is more necessary and more urgent than this very subject of a hall of records. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury and the accompanying papers are comparatively brief. It is a subject upon which Congress should be well advised, and I ask that the communication and accompanying papers may be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Indiana? The Chair hears none, and it is the order of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 167) for the relief of John L. Smithmeyer and Paul J. Pelz, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9280) for the relief of Hugh C. Preston, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1475) for the relief of Jean Louis Legare, of the Dominion of Canada, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CULLOM. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 223) to remodel the consular service of the United States, to report it back and ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration for the reason that a similar bill has been considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations and reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. PROCTOR on the 4th instant, proposing to make the salary of the consul at Moscow, Russia, $2,000, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. CARMACK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon;

A bill (H. R. 9383) granting a pension to Narcissa Tait; and

A bill (H. R. 597) granting a pension to Adella C. Chandler.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1308) for the relief of Mrs. Julia L. Hall, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PROCTOR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1809) to remove the charge of desertion now standing against Charles G. Brigham, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7997) granting an increase of pension to Henry Burns, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8493) granting a pension to Harry H. Sieg, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7432) granting a pension to Charles A. Sheafe, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 91) for the relief of the trustees of Carson-Newman College, at Mossycreek, Tenn., to report it adversely, and I ask that it be indefinitely postponed. A similar bill has already passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BATE. May I ask why the bill is to be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. WARREN. A similar bill has already passed and become a law.

Mr. BATE. Oh, yes; I understand. That is satisfactory.

WILLIAM C. MARR.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3830) for the relief of William C. Marr, to report it favorably without amendment. As the bill has but six lines, carries but $25, is payment for labor to a poor man who needs it, and is a House bill, I ask for its immediate consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

It proposes to pay to William C. Marr, of Popham Beach, Sagadahoc County, Me., $25, for his services as first assistant keeper of Seguin Island light, Maine, during the month of July, A. D. 1866.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATES OF ELAM D. TALBOTT AND CARTER B. BUTLER.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the bill (S. 2780) for the relief of the estate of Elam D. Talbott, deceased, and the bill (S. 3870) to refer the war claim of the estate of Carter B. Butler, deceased, to the Court of Claims, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the bills (S. 2780) and (S. 3870) entitled "A bill for the relief of the estate of Elam D. Talbott, deceased," and "A bill to refer the war claim of the estate of Carter B. Butler, deceased, to the Court of Claims," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887; and the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act, and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

COLUMBIA BRIDGE, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2797) for the relief of the legal owners of the Columbia bridge, at Columbia, Pa., reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 2797) entitled "A bill for the relief of the legal owners of the Columbia bridge, at Columbia, Pa.," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887. And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act, and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment providing for the payment to Theodore B. Beaulieu of $200.14, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from October 22, 1880, to date of payment, in settlement of his claim as assistant miller in the Government gristmill on the White Earth Indian Reservation, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on the Philippines, and ordered to be printed.

IRRIGATION INVESTIGATIONS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PERKINS submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,200 additional copies of the bulletin entitled "Irrigation Investigations in California, Bulletin No. 100, United States Department of Agriculture, Office of Experiment Stations, 1901," of which 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Department of Agriculture and 200 copies for the use of the Senate.

COMPILATION OF LAWS AGAINST TREASON, SEDITION, ETC.

Mr. FORAKER. I submit a resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That 6,000 copies of Senate Document No. 173, first session Fifty-seventh Congress, being a compilation of laws against treason, sedition, etc., be printed, with corrections, of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 for the House of Representatives, and 1,000 for the War Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the Senator from Ohio any idea of the cost?

Mr. FORAKER. Only $118, as estimated by the Printer.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10847) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that as the Secretary reads the bill the committee amendments may be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments shall first receive consideration. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The bill will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Senate," on page 2, line 16, after the word "dollars," to strike out "chief clerk and financial clerk at $3,000 each" and insert "chief clerk, $3,250; financial clerk, $3,000;" in line 20, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred" and insert "seven hundred and fifty;" in line 24, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred and ninety-two" and insert "seven hundred and fifty;" on page 3, line 2, before the word "librarian," to strike out "assistant financial clerk, and reading clerk, at $2,400 each" and insert "reading clerk, $2,500; assistant financial clerk, $2,400;" in line 9, after the word "thousand," to strike out $102.40" and insert "$220;" in line 16, before "laborers," to strike out "five" and insert "six;" and in line 17, after the word "all," to strike out "$67,674.40" and insert "$69,586;" so as to make the clause read:

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I was requested by the member of the House having charge of the bill in that body to ask the Senate to make an amendment. On page 12, line 15, after the word "thousand," I move to strike out "two" and insert "five;" and after the word "hundred," to strike out the words "and fifty;" so as to read:

Enrolling clerk, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. This amendment also was written by the member, and I was asked to have it made. On page 14, line 3, after the word "therein," I move to strike out "six" and insert "seven;" so as to read:

Laborer to clean Statuary Hall and watch statuary therein, $760.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. The two amendments just made will require a change in the totals.

On page 13, line 17, before the word "dollars," I move to strike out "five hundred and sixty," and insert "eight hundred and ten;" so as to read "$90,810."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. On page 14, line 7, before the word "hundred," I move to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so as to read "$26,240."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, this is an important bill. Is the Senator through with the amendments?

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to ask that the regular order, which comes up at 2 o'clock, be laid aside. I am through, as a matter of fact, and there may be no occasion for laying aside the regular order.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator is through with the amendments, before a vote is taken, as it is an important bill, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON in the chair). The Senator from Georgia suggests the absence of a quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Deboe,	Kean,	Perkins,
Bacon,	Depew,	Kearns,	Pettus,
Bard,	Dillingham,	Lodge,	Platt, Conn.
Bate,	Dolliver,	McComas,	Proctor,
Berry,	Elkins,	McCumber,	Scott,
Beveridge,	Fairbanks,	McLaurin, Miss.	Spooner,
Burnham,	Foraker,	McMillan,	Stewart,
Burrows,	Foster, Wash.	Martin,	Teller,
Burton,	Frye,	Millard,	Tillman,
Clark, Mont.	Gallinger,	Mitchell,	Warren,
Clay,	Hale,	Money,	Wetmore.
Cockrell,	Hanna,	Nelson,
Cullom,	Heitfeld,	Patterson,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have responded to their names. There is a quorum present. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1348) to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and the common defense; to promote commerce, and to encourage the deep-sea fisheries.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the unfinished business be laid aside for the time being without losing its place, that the appropriation bill may be completed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of the appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, one moment. The Senator from Georgia is not here.

Mr. BERRY. He is here.

Mr. CLAY. I am perfectly willing that the unfinished business shall be informally laid aside for this purpose. I have no objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. COCKRELL. I referred to the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

Mr. CULLOM. I said to the Senator from Georgia this morning that whenever he desired the floor this morning, I would give way.

Mr. BERRY. I do not think the senior Senator from Georgia wants to speak on the appropriation bill.

Mr. CULLOM. It will not be five minutes before the appropriation bill will be concluded, but I will take whatever course the Senator from Georgia prefers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the appropriation bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and still open to amendment. If there be no further amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to taking a vote on concurring in the amendments in gross? The Chair hears none.

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

COMMUTATION FOR TOWN-SITE PURPOSES IN OKLAHOMA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia to be so kind as to permit me to call up for consideration a short bill that is on the Calendar.

Mr. CLAY. I yield, if it will not lead to any debate.

Mr. BURTON. It will not lead to any debate. It is a House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CLAY. I yield.

Mr. BURTON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7933) providing for the commutation for town-site purposes of homestead entries in certain portions of Oklahoma.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That that portion of section 22 of the act approved May 2, 1890, entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Oklahoma, to enlarge the jurisdiction of the United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," providing for the commutation for town-site purposes of homestead entries in certain instances, be, and the same is hereby, made applicable to the lands in the Territory of Oklahoma ceded to the United States by the Wichita and affiliated bands of Indians and the Comanche, Kiowa, and Apache tribes of Indians, under agreements, respectively, ratified by the acts of Congress of March 2, 1895, and June 6, 1900.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is that a House bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a House bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It was not referred to any committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been reported by a committee of the Senate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What committee?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Public Lands. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2977) authorizing the Missouri and Meramec Water Company to take water from the Missouri River and to construct and maintain a dam or other devices for that purpose.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 1796) for the relief of Hiram Cronk;

A bill (H. R. 1939) granting an increase of pension to Penrose W. Reagan; and

A bill (H. R. 5863) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin Brittingham.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8581) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6570) to amend the act of May 12, 1900, authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to redeem or make allowance for internal-revenue stamps, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PAYNE, Mr. DALZELL, and Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 24) for the relief of James W. Howell;

A bill (S. 1931) granting an increase of pension to Etta Scott Mitchell;

A bill (S. 3157) granting an increase of pension to Rhody Ann Bradshaw;

A bill (H. R. 5218) granting an increase of pension to Joel Metz;

A bill (H. R. 5224) for the relief of Edward Kershner;

A bill (H. R. 5957) granting an increase of pension to Wright H. Auchmoody;

A bill (H. R. 5959) granting an increase of pension to Francis Pearson, alias James F. Pearston;

A bill (H. R. 7237) granting an increase of pension to Eva H. McColley;

A bill (H. R. 7623) granting a pension to Aaron M. Applegate;

A bill (H. R. 8304) granting an increase of pension to Angeline Murray;

A bill (H. R. 8306) granting an increase of pension to Thomas W. Robinson;

A bill (H. R. 8336) to amend section 3 of chapter 480 of the laws of the United States, approved June 23, 1874;

A bill (H. R. 8620) granting a pension to Thomas Hall;

A bill (H. R. 9670) granting an increase of pension to Aaron C. Badger; and

A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 106) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Pennsylvania Society of the Sons of the American Revolution certain Revolutionary trophies at Allegheny Arsenal, Pittsburg, Pa.

PROMOTION OF COMMERCE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1348) to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and the common defense; to promote commerce, and to encourage the deep-sea fisheries.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, the bill now before us professes to be a bill to provide for ocean mail service, the common defense, to promote commerce, and to encourage deep-sea fisheries. It is but just to say that while the bill received a favorable report from the Committee on Commerce the minority of the committee voted unanimously against a favorable report.

The high character and standing of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the author of the bill, will lead many Senators to give their approval and assent to the measure without making that critical examination which such important legislation deserves. Without regard to party lines, the distinguished chairman, who presides with marked ability and perfect impartiality over the deliberations of this body, is beloved and highly esteemed by the committee from which this bill receives a favorable report. The criticisms which I shall apply to the measure are intended in no wise as a reflection upon his ability or integrity. We belong to different schools of politics; view many economic and public questions from a different standpoint. Such discussion ought to be conducted free from abuse and misrepresentations, and this course I shall pursue, using alone during this entire debate the weapons of truth and logic, that the country may reach an intelligent conclusion as to the merits of this new legislation.

It is my purpose to analyze the bill, keeping in view my subject, disconnected with any other matter, and to present to the Senate the serious objections which I entertain against its passage. I shall not consume any unnecessary time, neither shall I indulge in extravagant and unnecessary criticism, but shall express my mature convictions, based upon the most rigid investigation. I have given to every section of the bill careful study, and the conclusions which I have reached I believe will stand the test of legitimate, impartial, and intelligent criticism. I now address myself to that provision of the bill which proposes to amend the present law relating to the ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports.

Before doing so I will say that I favor legislation that will give the United States a foreign mail service equal if not superior to England, Germany, France, or any other foreign country; such a mail service as will be adequate to the interest and demands of the American people. I am unwilling for the commercial or any other interest of my country to be retarded for the want of a foreign mail service, but, at the same time, such postal service should be procured for a just and reasonable price, based on sound business principles, disconnected with any subsidy scheme. I am unwilling to give my vote for any measure making exorbitant appropriations ostensibly for postal purposes when, in fact, a large part of the price paid for carrying the mail is intended as a gratuity to shipowners, to aid them to carry on their private business.

The line of argument I wish now to pursue is to point out the changes in the foreign mail service if this bill shall become a law. In October, 1891, Congress passed a law to provide ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports. This act authorizes the Postmaster-General to enter into contracts for a term of not less than five nor more than ten years with American citizens for the carrying of mail on American steamers between the ports of the United States and such ports in foreign countries as in his judgment would best subserve the postal interests of the United States, and provides that the contracts shall be made with the lowest responsible bidder for the performance of the service, and gives the Postmaster-General the right to reject all bids not in his opinion reasonable, and divides ships into four classes to be used for foreign mail purposes.

The first-class shall have a speed equal to 480 miles per day, and with a tonnage capacity of 8,000 tons; the second-class, a speed equal to 384 miles per day, and with a gross registered tonnage of not less than 5,000 tons; the third-class shall be capable of maintaining a speed of 336 miles per day, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 2,500 tons; and the fourth-class shall be capable of maintaining a speed of 288 miles per day, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 1,500 tons.

The rate of compensation paid to such steamers, under the act of 1891, for carrying our foreign mail will be found in the fifth section of the act, and it is as follows: The first-class ships above described shall receive not exceeding $4 per mile; second-class, not exceeding $2 per mile; third-class, not exceeding $1 per mile, and fourth-class, not exceeding 66⅔ cents per mile; and these ships are paid for each outward voyage by the shortest practicable route and for the actual number of miles required by the Postmaster-General to be traveled on each outward-bound voyage. I will ask that the act of 1891 be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the act referred to by the Senator from Georgia will be inserted in the RECORD. [See Appendix A.]

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, under the provisions of this special act and the general law making provision for our foreign mail service we spent for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, $1,826,026, divided as follows: Trans-Atlantic, $528,537; trans-Pacific, $264,180; miscellaneous, $547,664; to foreign steamers, $575,665. These respective amounts include the entire expenditures for our foreign mail service for the last fiscal year. For the current fiscal year the estimates of expenditures for the same service, under existing law, amount to $2,313,110.

Under the act of 1891 the Postmaster-General has already executed contracts with several lines for the carrying of foreign mail. We have a contract with the American Line which will expire in 1905; this line operates between New York and Southampton; also a contract with the Oceanic Line, which operates between San Francisco and Australia, which will not expire until October 31, 1910; also a contract with the Admiral Line, between Boston, Philadelphia, and Jamaica, which expires December 31, 1909; a contract with the Red D Line between New York and Venezuela, which will expire February 28, 1902; and contracts with the New York and Cuban Mail Steamship Company to Habana and Mexico, which expired October 31, 1902. These contracts for carrying our mail were easily made in pursuance of the act of 1891, which we are trying to amend, and the compensation agreed upon was readily accepted by the shipowners. This leads me to believe that our foreign mail can be conveyed to the ports of the world at the rates fixed by the law now in existence.

We have had no complaint from the Postmaster-General that the rate was too low, and that if other lines were necessary to complete our foreign mail service such lines could not be established and operated for the prices fixed by the present law. Now, what changes will take place in the act of 1891 should the present bill pass? There are two changes I desire to note: First, what classes of ships will be employed in the foreign mail service in the event the measure we are now considering shall become a law, and, second, especially, what prices will we pay for our foreign mail service in comparison with the prices we now pay? What increased expenditures will necessarily follow by reason of this legislation?

What additional expense will follow in our foreign mail service when the provisions of this bill shall be put in operation? While the present law provides for four classes of ships to be used in the foreign mail service, the amendments which we are now considering provide for seven classes: First class, with a tonnage capacity of 10,000 tons and a speed equal to 480 miles per day; second class, with the same tonnage capacity and a speed equal to 456 miles per day; third class, with a speed of 432 miles per day; fourth class, with a speed of 408 miles per day; fifth class, with a speed of 384 miles per day; sixth class, with a speed of 360 miles per day, each with a tonnage capacity of 5,000 tons; and the seventh, with a speed equal to 336 miles per day, with a capacity of 2,000 tons.

These are the ships the Postmaster-General will be authorized and directed to employ for foreign mail purposes when this bill shall receive the sanction of the law-making power; and instead of paying so much per mile for carrying our foreign mail in the future we will pay so much per gross ton for ships used for that purpose, regardless of the freight they carry and for what other purposes they may be used. Such a ship may sail across the ocean with nothing except the mail; the compensation will be the same. The proposed bill, instead of providing $4, $3, $2, and $1 per mile to the different classes of ships carrying foreign mail, provides compensation per gross registered ton, as follows: First-class ships, as above described, 2.7 cents per gross registered ton for each hundred nautical miles sailed from the port of clearance to the port of entry; second class, 2.5 cents; third class, 2.3 cents; fourth class, 2.1 cents; fifth class, 1.9 cents; sixth class, 1.7 cents; seventh class, 1.5 cents.

This bill does not provide compensation in proportion to the work performed or the mail carried. The object and purpose is not to provide steamers purely for mail purposes, fixing the compensation on just and reasonable lines in proportion to the services performed, but really to give a certain amount to shipowners for commercial purposes and to build up a certain line and class of business at the expense of the public Treasury under the cover and guise of postal services. Disconnected with such purpose no party, as a business proposition, would pay the prices fixed by this bill for foreign mail contracts. No effort was made to show to the Committee on Commerce that there was any necessity for increased pay in carrying our foreign mail.

It is surprising to me that such a radical and expensive modification of our postal laws relating to ocean foreign mail service should be made without the Postmaster-General being called before the committee to point out the reasons for such a change, and at the same time to make estimates of the increased cost of this new service. I have said that under the bill we are now considering the expenditures for carrying our foreign mail would be largely increased, that swift steamers employed for mail purposes would be much more expensive than if the same steamers were used under the act of 1891.

Now, why do I make this statement? There can be no dispute of this proposition; all that is necessary to point out the difference of expenditures arising under the act of 1891 and the present bill is simply to make the calculation, and this difference can be ascertained to the cent. The calculations on this line, made by the Commissioner of Navigation, are substantially correct. Under the act of 1891 a first-class ship carrying foreign mail from New York to Southampton would receive $14,564; the same ship used for mail purposes at the rate of compensation fixed in the present bill would receive $19,881; this would apply to either the St. Louis or the St. Paul. Both of these are 21-knot ships.

Now take either the Philadelphia or New York. Both of these are 20-knot ships, and under the act of 1891 we would pay to each of these ships per trip for carrying the mail from New York to Southampton $14,556, and under the bill now before us we would pay for the same services $18,238, an increase of $3,674 per trip. We now pay for carrying the mail from San Francisco to Australia to a ship with a speed of 17 knots $16,659 per trip. Under the bill we are now discussing, for the same services we would pay $19,020, an increase of $2,361. Where we now pay $1,247 per trip for mail services from New York to Mexico, under the present bill we would pay $2,503 per trip, an increase of $1,256.

This bill contemplates establishing many new lines, so the majority of the committee tell us—a fortnightly mail service from San Francisco via Honolulu to Yokohama, Shanghai, and Hongkong, with connections to Manila. The distance for this round voyage would be, approximately, 15,000 miles. The rates fixed for such a voyage, under the provisions of the bill now before us, would be $41,400 per trip, equal to $1,076,400 per year. Such a mail route established and put in operation under existing law would cost not exceeding $30,000 per trip, a difference of $11,400. The majority also tell us that under the provisions of this bill a fortnightly mail service will be established from Puget Sound directly to Japan, Shanghai, and Hongkong, connecting with Manila.

The distance of such a voyage will be approximately 12,600 miles, and the maximum per voyage will be equal to $31,752 every trip made. Such a service, put in operation under the act of 1891, would cost per round trip not exceeding $25,000, a difference of more than $6,000 per trip. This new legislation contemplates a fortnightly mail service from San Francisco, via Honolulu, to Australia, and the whole amount involved in these propositions will be equal to $2,235,000. This vast amount will be spent for mail services to establish trans-Pacific mail lines.

The majority of the committee say to us that the new routes proposed, together with the routes now in existence through contracts under the act of 1891, may be thus summarized: Semiweekly mail to Jamaica, $123,569; semiweekly mail to Habana, $73,476; weekly mail to Mexico, $130,104; semiweekly mail to Southampton, $1,713,863; once in ten days to Venezuela, $81,288; fortnightly to Brazil, $243,100, making the total Atlantic service cost $2,365,400; weekly mail to Manila, Japan, China, Hongkong, and Hawaii, $1,901,952; fortnightly to Pago Pago and fortnightly to Australia, $433,000, making the total cost of the service $4,700,352, as against $1,826,046 consumed in the foreign mail service during the last fiscal year.

These lines make no provision for an American mail service via Colon and Panama to the west coast of South America and to the Central American States. There exists now, under the act of 1891, a semiweekly mail service to Jamaica and Habana, a weekly service to Mexico, a weekly service to Southampton, and a service once every ten days to Venezuela. We have a weekly service with British Honduras, Guatemala, and the Republic of Honduras, and a weekly service with Costa Rica and Nicaragua. Mails for the northern ports of Brazil were dispatched 48 times last year, and the mails for Brazil generally were dispatched 53 times by steamers sailing from New York during the last fiscal year. The inference drawn from the majority report that no mail routes now exist to Brazil is not borne out by the report of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails.

By means of steamers sailing four times a month from San Francisco and once or twice a month from Tacoma or Seattle, mails for Japan and China have been dispatched not less than six times a month. These mails have included articles for the Philippines, but mails for the Philippines have also been dispatched by naval vessels and by steamers chartered for military services which sailed from San Francisco for Manila in the interval between the sailings of the regular mail steamers during the year. Correspondence by Japan and China has also been forwarded by Vancouver, and mail for the Australasian colonies has been dispatched from San Francisco once every three weeks. Most of the steamers en route for Japan and China usually call at Honolulu, so that there are not less than seven opportunities a month for communication by mail for Hawaii. So, Mr. President, it will be seen that the foreign mail under the act of 1891 has been ample and efficient.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will it interrupt the Senator if I ask him a question right there?

Mr. CLAY. Not at all.

Mr. ALDRICH. Are all the steamers which have been alluded to by the Senator in the statement he has just made receiving pay under the act of 1891?

Mr. CLAY. I think not.

To give a correct idea of the foreign mail service under existing law, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD, at the close of my remarks, pages 744, 745, and down to "Casualties," on page 746 of the report of the Postmaster-General for the year 1901, giving a description of the foreign mail service during that time. [See Appendix B.]

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I am not going to ask the Senator from Georgia any other question except a simple one, and that is, Are the steamers to which the Senator has alluded that are carrying the mails American-built steamers or steamers flying the American flag?

Mr. CLAY. I did not say that they were American steamers, but we are getting the mails carried, while the majority of the committee insist that we are not. We are carrying the mails by the different mail lines to which I have just alluded, and I desire to say to the Senator that I have derived my information from the report of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was not doubting the amount of mail carried, but I desired the Senate to understand that the mails were not being carried on American vessels.

Mr. CLAY. I am not able to say how much of the mail is carried by foreign steamships and how much by American steamships. That question I have not investigated; but that the mail is carried as I have described I have not a doubt, because the Postmaster-General himself says so in his report.

This description will give a proper comparison of the routes and services to be performed under the act of 1891 and the present bill. But, Mr. President, I desire to adhere to the line of argument I was pursuing in giving the cost of the service under this bill in comparison with the present law. This difference can be more forcibly illustrated by giving the amounts per mile that ships would receive for carrying foreign mail under the law of 1891 and the amount ships would receive for the same service under the provisions of this bill. First, take ships with a capacity of 10,000 tons: The 20-knot ship under the act of 1891 would receive $4 per mile, and under the proposed bill the same ship would receive $4.70 per mile. The 19-knot ship under the law of 1891 would receive $2 per mile; the same ship under the proposed bill would receive $4.36 per mile.

A ship with a speed of 16, 17, and 18 knots, under the act of 1891, each would receive $2 per mile, while an 18-knot ship, under the bill of 1901, would receive $4 per mile; a 17-knot ship, $3.65 per mile; a 16-knot ship, $3.30 per mile; a 15-knot ship, $2.96, and a 14-knot ship, $2.61 per mile. Now, take ships with a tonnage capacity of 9,000 tons. Under the proposed bill, a 19-knot ship would receive $3.60 per mile; an 18-knot ship, $3.60 per mile; a 17-knot ship, $3.29 per mile; a 16-knot ship, $2.97 per mile; a 15-knot ship, $2.66 per mile; a 14-knot ship, $2.35 per mile; while under the act of 1891, which we are now proposing to amend, ships with speed as above specified would only receive $2 per mile for carrying foreign mail, except the 14 and 15 knot ships, and each of these would receive $1 per mile, and 13 and 12 knot ships would receive 66⅔ cents per mile.

Practically the same results will be obtained with ships ranging from 8,000 to 5,000 tons. Take ships with a tonnage capacity of 7,000 tons carrying our foreign mails. Under existing law, the five classes known as 20, 19, 18, 17, and 16 knots, would each receive $2 per mile; under this bill the first three classes would each receive $2.80 per mile, an increase of 80 cents per mile over the act of 1891. I think these figures will be found to be exactly correct.

Mr. HANNA. May I ask the Senator where he obtains his figures?

Mr. CLAY. I took the report of the Committee on Commerce and I took the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, and worked them out. I think you will find that my figures will tally with those contained in the report of the Commissioner of Navigation.

Thus far I have been dealing with ships used in carrying foreign mails, with a tonnage capacity of from 5,000 to 10,000 tons and ranging in speed from 12 to 20 knots; and it will be seen that the pay of this class of ships for carrying foreign mails would be greatly increased by the pending bill in comparison with the law we are endeavoring to amend. Thus far in the discussion of this question I have not dealt with ships with a tonnage capacity below 4,000 tons.

A critical examination of the bill points out the fact that when you reach ships with a tonnage capacity below 3,000 tons for carrying foreign mails a different result will be reached in regard to the expenses arising in comparison with the law of 1891. Ships with a capacity of 3,000 tons under the bill before us would receive 78 cents per mile for carrying foreign mail, and the same ships under the act of 1891 would receive $1 per mile. Ships with a capacity of 2,000 tons under the present bill would receive 52 cents per mile for carrying foreign mail, while under the law of 1891 such ships would receive 67 cents per mile. There will be no material decrease except ships with a tonnage capacity ranging from 3,000 to 2,000 tons, and a very few of this class of ships will be used for carrying our foreign mails.

I am not surprised that the majority of the committee admit in their report that the increased expenditures for carrying foreign mails will amount to nearly $3,000,000—more than double the expense of the last fiscal year. That is not correct. It is not more than double the expense. The expense last year was about $1,800,000. It can not be justified by any information thus far presented to the committee or the Senate. Mr. President, I do not desire to be misunderstood. I am not opposed to an ocean mail service for the United States. I favor such service and want to see our ocean mail service equal, if not superior, to that of Great Britain, France, Germany, or any other foreign power.

If we desire to establish new routes, involving an expenditure of $3,000,000 for postal services, facts should have been presented to justify such expenditure. The Postmaster-General should have submitted an elaborate report pointing out the routes he desired to establish, putting the Senate in possession of all the information he could obtain bearing upon such routes, together with an itemized statement of expense necessarily following. It is surprising to me that the majority of the committee should have made a favorable report for such additional annual expenditure without data and information to justify the same. If you will take the annual report of the Postmaster-General, you will nowhere find that he has made any recommendation to Congress favoring such legislation, and nowhere can the majority of the committee point out, either in his annual report or from anyone's testimony, that this additional expenditure is necessary.

The Superintendent of Foreign Mails certainly ought to have information that would be valuable to the Senate in regard to the bill now before us. He ought to be able to point out wherein the present law is inefficient, and if there be any valid reason for such increased pay in the foreign-mail service and for the establishment of these new expensive routes by reason of his long experience he ought to be able to present with clearness and force the reason for such change; but the majority of the committee, in hot haste, made a favorable report to the Senate without even calling this officer before them to give his views.

When we employ railroads to carry to every section of our great country the mails, we do not make such contracts to confer any special favor upon railroads, we pay them a certain sum of money for carrying our domestic mails, for services performed in proportion to the amount carried. We owe it to the people to see that these contracts are just and reasonable, and when we employ steamships to carry our foreign mails such employment should be made in good faith, disconnected with any subsidy scheme, paying to the shipowners a fair and reasonable price in proportion to the services performed, and not with the view and purpose of subsidizing the shipping interests under the guise of carrying foreign mails.

If the party in power desire to subsidize such private interests at the expense of the people of the United States, then let them have the courage to do it openly, to go into the public Treasury and take the money collected by taxation from the people and donate it to the shipowners. Call it by its proper name, "subsidy," and not pay for carrying foreign mails, when in fact such expenditures are made for no such purpose, but really as a part of a great subsidy scheme, and then attempt to cover up such a scheme from public disclosure by declaring that such a vast sum is needed for postal purposes.

I hold in my hand the report of the Postmaster-General, which contains the report of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails, showing the weight of mail dispatched by sea to foreign countries, the expenditures made during the last fiscal year, and the amount necessary and required for the fiscal year of 1903. This estimate sets forth the sea transportation of the mails, including foreign-closed mails, the railway transit across the Isthmus of Panama, the cost of maintaining the United States postal agency at Shanghai, and contingencies, including casualties, $2,455,000; for the expense of maintaining 18 sea post-offices on steamers plying between New York, Southampton, Bremen, and Hamburg, $50,000; for the transfer service in New York Harbor to and from transfer boats, $38,000; for balances due foreign countries, $160,000; making a total of $2,702,000.

Mr. HARRIS. Will it interrupt the Senator for me to ask him a question, as he seems to have a great mastery of this subject?

Mr. CLAY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to know whether there is any provision for competition in letting the mail contracts which are provided for in this bill?

Mr. CLAY. The mail contracts will be entirely in the hands of the Postmaster-General. He is to advertise for them and exercise his discretion. He can reject any of the bids that he may desire to reject and accept such bids as he may desire to accept. The whole matter is left entirely in the hands of the Postmaster-General. That is my understanding.

I was going on to say that the total amount asked for by the Superintendent of Foreign Mails and by the Postmaster-General amounts to less than $2,500,000.

Mr. HANNA. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. HANNA. It is prompted by the question of the Senator from Kansas. Is it not a fact that all mail contracts are let in that way, and that the Postmaster-General is the final arbiter of those contracts?

Mr. CLAY. I think the Senator from Ohio is correct. My understanding is that under the act of 1891, as far as that is concerned, the foreign mail service is left to the Postmaster-General of the United States in regard to the contracts that he makes, and it is a matter in his discretion.

Mr. HANNA. The point I wanted to bring out is simply that there is nothing in this bill that establishes any different precedents from those always observed in the letting of mail contracts.

Mr. CLAY. I have not said so.

Mr. HANNA. I was answering over your shoulder the question of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CLAY. The foregoing estimate comes from the report of the Postal Department of our Government, and is the total sum recommended by the Postal Department for carrying our foreign mails for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and this report includes the percentage of increase of the items of business for the next fiscal year over the last fiscal year and provides for an efficient service for the South American Republics, and with this report staring us in the face, without giving a single reason for such action, we have more than doubled previous expenditures, except the majority of the committee tell us that Great Britain, Germany, and France and other foreign powers pay large sums for carrying foreign mails, hence we should do likewise.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. MITCHELL. I may have misunderstood the Senator, but I understood him a moment ago to state that the whole matter of letting these contracts is under the control of the Postmaster-General and that he would have the power to reject any and all bids. I had the impression from what the Senator said that he thought the Postmaster-General might reject the lowest bid and take one higher.

Now, is it not a fact that the power of the Postmaster-General is limited by this first section so that if he lets a contract at all he is compelled to let it to the lowest responsible bidder, but if he rejects the lowest bid——

Mr. CLAY. He advertises in the different newspapers, and the cities where he shall advertise are specified, for bids for carrying the foreign mails, and he advertises for the lowest bidder. However, when he goes over the bids, if, in his opinion, the lowest bid ought not to be accepted, my understanding is that he can reject it, and that has been the law, I think, all the while.

Mr. MITCHELL. He can reject the lowest bid provided he thinks the bid is unreasonable; but he has no power, I take it, under this bill to reject the lowest bid and take a higher one.

Mr. CLAY. I differ with the Senator from Oregon. I think that under the postal laws of the United States, under the act of 1891——

Mr. MITCHELL. I call the attention of the Senator to the language of the first section. It says:

> The mail service on such lines to be equitably distributed among the Atlantic, Mexican Gulf, and Pacific ports. Said contracts shall be made with the lowest responsible bidder for the performance of said service on each route, and the Postmaster-General shall have the right to reject all bids not in his opinion reasonable for the attaining of the purposes named.

That is to say, if the lowest bid is one that, in his judgment, is not reasonable, he may reject it, but he can not reject it, I take it, and let the contract to a bid that is higher.

Mr. CLAY. The Postmaster-General is authorized to exercise a discretion. My understanding is he has the right to exercise his discretion in accepting such other bids as he may think best for the Government. He may accept or reject the lowest bid——

Mr. MITCHELL. Right there, if the Senator will allow me just a moment, is where I differ with the Senator, because I think there is an absolute limit upon his power by compelling him to let the contract, if he lets it at all, to the lowest bidder. But he may set aside the lowest bidder because, in his judgment, it may be unreasonable.

Mr. CLAY. I am quite sure the Senator will find that on this point of view he is mistaken.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. Just a moment. What I can not understand is how there are specific provisions for the payment of so much per mile for carrying the mail, and yet how that can be reconciled with competition and letting contracts to the lowest bidder.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me?

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Georgia will explain that, I shall be much obliged to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. I wish to suggest, in answer to what was said by the Senator from Oregon, that the bill does not require the Postmaster-General to let a contract to the lowest bidder, but to the lowest responsible bidder, and the Postmaster-General is, in his discretion, to say who is responsible and who is not responsible. He may come to the conclusion that a man who is the lowest bidder is not a responsible bidder and give the contract to one who bids higher than he.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS] asked me a question which ought to be answered. I ought to be able to answer it, and I think I can do so. He asked how can there be any competition if the bill fixes so much per mile or so much per gross registered ton for carrying the mail, and then why have any bids at all so far as the lowest bidder is concerned. The Senator from Kansas would be correct, but the rates are not arbitrary. The bill fixes these amounts at the maximum. The amounts that I have set forth here in my speech are the maximum amounts fixed by the law. If it can be obtained cheaper, then they are authorized to obtain it cheaper. He is directed to advertise for cheaper rates, but can not go beyond the limits fixed in the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. If there is a maximum amount fixed, will it not be generally understood among the mail carriers, and will they not inevitably make their bids correspond to the maximum amount which they can get?

Mr. CLAY. Unquestionably. I have never seen that fail. You will always find that to be the case. Fix the maximum rates, no bids will be made for less than these rates.

They forget, however, to tell us the difference between our Government and her outlying possessions and those of Great Britain. Great Britain has dependencies in almost every quarter of the globe, her dependencies amount to more than 350,000,000 people and are scattered everywhere, and she has always been anxious to enlarge rather than abridge her possessions.

England, including Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, has a population of 38,000,000 people. India alone, one of her dependencies, has a population of 287,000,000. The East India possessions extend over a territory larger than Europe without Russia. The entire population of the Empire at present will reach 390,000,000 of souls, with an area of 11,335,806 square miles, with a population nearly five times that of ours and with an area that more than trebles ours. She could not afford to deny communication with those sent abroad with her army or to those of her subjects sent abroad to establish houses of merchandise and commerce in her various dependencies. She is an Empire, a kingly government, seeking to extend her power and dominions and to build up great estates, not a republic. The Governments of Europe have had little regard for the welfare of the masses.

I sincerely hope we may never arrive at that period when we are willing to forsake that spirit of justice and equality which has characterized our Republic in the past and follow in the footsteps of the monarchs of Europe. Simply to state that Great Britain pays more than $4,500,000 for carrying foreign mails, and that we must do likewise, is no argument in favor of the passage of this bill.

I have before me a statement received from the Commissioner of Navigation which I will ask to insert in the RECORD at the close of my remarks. This statement gives the weight of the foreign mail of Great Britain and her dependencies for the last fiscal year. These figures are taken from the report of the British postmaster-general, and give the weight of letters and postal cards and other articles exchanged by the United Kingdom with foreign countries and British colonies, based on the results of the latest statistics taken under the provision of the Universal Postal Convention; and what do we find from this report of the British postmaster-general?

Now, let us see how much we pay in comparison with England for the purpose of carrying our foreign mail. England has more weight. Her foreign mails weigh more than three times what our foreign mails weigh. The total weight of letters and postal cards dispatched to and from Great Britain, commonly called foreign mail, for the last fiscal year amounted to 3,073,800 pounds. The total weight of the circulars, books, patterns, and newspapers was 20,970,300 pounds, making the total weight of the foreign mail of Great Britain for twelve calendar months 24,044,100 pounds, and she paid for carrying this amount of foreign mail $4,500,000.

Now, let us make an examination and see what was the weight of the foreign mail of the United States during the last fiscal year. This information is furnished us by the Superintendent of Foreign Mails in the report of the Postmaster General: Letters and postal cards, 1,086,448 pounds; other articles, 8,112,405 pounds, making the total weight of our foreign mail during the last fiscal year 9,198,853 pounds; consequently it will be seen that the weight of Great Britain's foreign mail was nearly three times greater than ours.

Yet we pay $2,000,000 annually for carrying our foreign mail, while Great Britain pays about $4,500,000. It will thus appear that the foreign mail service of Great Britain, in proportion to the weight of her foreign mail, is cheaper than the foreign mail service of the United States. Germany only paid $1,825,651 for her foreign mail service, less than the United States paid. An examination of the present foreign mail service of Germany will show that for the last half dozen years she has obtained her foreign mail service for less than we pay under the present law. I have been unable to procure any figures from the French Government giving the total amount of the foreign mail service of France; hence I can not make the comparison as to France.

Mail pay or mail subsidy and general subsidy rest on entirely different principles. Mail subsidy can be justified only on the basis of value received by the Government in the carrying of our mails and, properly speaking, is not a subsidy. If the Government pays more than a reasonable price, and does not receive value for what it pays, it can not be justified, and the payment must be regarded as a mere bonus. The general subsidy is a pure bonus without any returns or benefit to the Government; it is a pure gift from the public Treasury to the shipowners.

I am forcibly struck with an editorial published in the New York Evening Post of January 14, 1902, analyzing the present bill. This editorial refers to the fact that the act of 1891 was preeminently in the interest of the American Line, and the amendments now before Congress, by means of that concealment of special gifts under technical provisions which was such a feature under the former subsidy bill, is still more directly a gift to that line. This editorial so clearly sets forth the objections which I entertain against the mail features of this bill I ask that it be read and inserted at this point as a part of my remarks.

[The Evening Post, New York, Tuesday, January 14, 1902.]

SENATOR FRYE'S POSTAL SUBSIDY.

The new ship-subsidy bill, which has been introduced by Senator FRYE, is made up of two entirely distinct parts, the first relating to mail subsidy and the second to general subsidy. These are not only kept entirely distinct in the provisions of the bill, but they rest on entirely different principles. The mail subsidy, if justifiable, can be given only on the basis of value received by the Government in the carrying of the mails. If the Government does not receive value for what it pays, the system has no justification, and the payment must be regarded as a mere bonus. It is not difficult in this case to pass on the question of value received. The present bill, so far as it relates to mail subsidies, merely amends the postal-subsidy act of 1901 by increasing the compensation to vessels and altering their classification.

The act of 1891 was preeminently in the interest of the American Line, and the amendment now before Congress, by means of that concealment of special gifts under technical provisions which was such a feature of the former subsidy bill, is still more directly a gift to that line. The limit of the tonnage of the vessels of the first class, which are to receive the highest subsidy, has been apparently so fixed as to exclude every American vessel afloat except the four ships of the American Line. During the last fiscal year of the Post-Office Department the American Line carried about 71,000,000 grams of letters and 641,000,000 grams of printed matter, for which the Government, under the act of 1891, paid it $528,536. During the same year the Cunard Line carried almost twice this weight of letters (137,000,000 grams) and 835,000,000 grams of printed matter, but received for the service only $213,103; and the White Star Line, which carried about 62,000,000 grams of letters and 326,000,000 grams of printed matter, received but $91,591—that is, the Government is now paying to the American Line for an irregular service a rate about three times higher than it pays for service by other lines carrying the same mails, and this on a theory of "value received."

More than this, a most unfortunate question is suggested by the figures of the Post-Office foreign mail department, which demands an explanation. Under the act of 1891 the compensation fixed was $4 a mile "by the shortest practicable route for each outward-bound voyage." It is a matter of the commonest knowledge that in estimating miles at sea the nautical mile is the uniform standard. The length of routes and the speed of ships are as invariably measured by nautical miles as land distances are measured by statute miles. It would be as incorrect and misleading to estimate the distance between New York and Southampton in land miles as to estimate the distance between New York and Philadelphia in nautical miles. Any estimates based on such a departure from the standards of distance would invite inquiry as to some special purpose to be served.

It appears, however, from the official reports of the Department that for 36 voyages made in the last year the American Line ships received an average of $14,681 per trip. At the rate fixed by the statute this means that the line has been collecting from the Government by estimating the distance from New York to Southampton at 3,670 miles, which exceeds by over 500 miles the actual length of the route in nautical miles, and is just about equal to its length in land miles. If this method of applying the land unit to nautical measurement has been followed, the loss to the Government and the gain to the line has been about $100,000 a year, and it is quite in order for the public to demand from the postal authorities a prompt and full explanation of the matter.

With these actual operations of the act of 1891 in mind, it is interesting to note that the amendment which the present bill makes does not require any faster or better or more efficient service, nor does it in any way look to the further protection of the interests of those who are concerned in the prompt carrying of the mails. It merely provides for an increase in the compensation, which, as Senator FRYE, the sponsor for the bill, estimates, will make the amount paid about one-third larger than at present. The real situation of this mail contract and the real intention of the proposed amendment require so much examination of the official figures and analysis of the technical provisions of the bill that probably comparatively few, even in Congress, appreciate the plan of the bill. But when analyzed and sifted the real situation is that the Government is now paying the American Line, under the act of 1891, at a rate about three times as high as the market rate for carrying the mails, and that this amendment does not in any way attempt to improve the service, but only increases the compensation.

There may be circumstances where a subsidy will serve to create a new mail route, and so open to commerce, as well as to the mails, a means of communication which it did not formerly have and which could not exist without a subsidy. A bill which should provide for subsidy only on new mail routes might accomplish a useful purpose, but to increase the already exorbitant rate paid for an existing service over a route where we now have ample facilities confers no benefits on the taxpayer, and is merely a Government contribution to the dividends of the favored line.

Mr. President, I do not desire to consume unnecessary time in discussing the mail features of this bill, and I will now proceed to present my objections to the subsidy feature of the measure disconnected with the foreign mail service.

Now, let us see what are the provisions of this bill. I do not intend to discuss anything except the bill which we have before us now. I have been so trained in my life as a lawyer that I am compelled to confine my remarks to the subject that I am discussing. Sometimes in the Senate we can discuss a hundred things in the same day, but I can not do it. Consequently I must come to the subject which we are now considering.

Let us see what are the provisions of Title II, headed "General subsidy." Section 6 provides that after the 1st of July the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to pay out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to the owner or owners of any vessel of the United States duly registered by a citizen or citizens of the United States, including any corporation created under the laws of the United States or any of the States thereof, and being at the time of entry engaged in the foreign trade of the United States, which shall be entered in the United States from a foreign port or from any port in the Philippine Islands, compensation, as follows:

On each entry, not exceeding sixteen entries in any fiscal year of a sail or steam vessel, 1 cent per gross registered ton for each nautical mile sailed, and one-fourth of 1 per cent gross registered ton additional for ships built and registered after the passage of this act, this additional compensation to last for a period of five years.

The majority of the committee tell us that this sum must be taken from the public Treasury and given to the owners of ships engaged in our foreign trade in order to enable American shipowners to carry freights as cheaply as foreign shipowners; that Great Britain, Germany, France, Norway, and other foreign powers now take their ships, come to our ports, and carry our corn, wheat, lumber, cotton, and farm products to foreign markets at a freight rate so low that American citizens can not take their ships and compete with such foreign competition, and that the subsidy, taken from the public Treasury under the provisions of this bill and given to the American shipowners, is to equalize the difference in the cost of construction and operation of American and foreign built ships. The majority say we pay foreigners for transportation because they can carry our products more cheaply than American shipowners; that European capitalists have been willing to take a less interest on their money, and, consequently, have invested in ships to be engaged in foreign commerce.

If this be true our export trade has certainly not suffered because of the lower freight rates. If a foreign shipowner will carry to the markets of the world in his ship for less than an American, it is in the interest of the exportation of American products that we should let the foreigner carry them, and so gain advantage of as cheap freight rates as possible. The American farmer and producer, in sending to foreign markets the products of the farm, certainly will not complain because freight rates have been exceedingly low. The growth of our export trade has been phenomenal. The Statistical Abstract of the Treasury Department shows a most gratifying state of facts as to our export trade. In 1868 they were $7.29 per capita; 1882, $13.97 per capita; 1892, $15.61 per capita; 1900, $17.96 per capita, and the figures of 1900 had not been equaled at any other period within our history.

Our total exports in 1890 amounted to 23,617,658 tons; in 1901 amounted to 24,889,368 tons. The total value of our export trade in 1851 was only $188,915,259; in 1860, $333,576,057; in 1879, $392,771,768; in 1880, $835,638,658; in 1890, $857,828,684; in 1900,

$1,394,483,082, and in 1901 still greater, larger than in any other period within our history. Our exports exceeded our imports by more than a half million of dollars. Our friends on the other side of the Chamber make no complaint as to our export trade.

Nobody can complain of our exports. Our farmers and our merchants have sent their products of the farm and their manufactured products to all the ports of the world at the lowest freight rates in the history of our country. The farmers and manufacturers found ships in abundance to carry the products of the farm and factory to the markets of the world at freight rates the cheapest in our history. The only complaint made by the majority of the committee and the only argument used by them in the advocacy of the passage of this bill is that freight rates have been so low that the American shipowner could not carry the products of our farm and factory as cheaply as foreign shipowners had conveyed them. Hence the American people are asked to go down in their pockets and to make a donation to the American shipowner to aid him in charging higher prices in operating American ships in the foreign carrying trade.

The majority of the committee give three reasons for asking Government aid to the American shipowner: First, they say it costs the American shipowner more money to build ships for the foreign trade than it costs foreigners to build the same ships; secondly, that American wages are higher, that American seamen receive more pay than foreign seamen, and that it costs more money to operate an American ship than it does a foreign ship; consequently, the American shipowner can not operate his ship in competition with a foreign ship; and, thirdly, that foreign countries subsidize their merchant marine and that the American shipowner can not come in successful competition with the subsidized ships of foreign countries,

These three propositions I propose to controvert, and I believe that, to the unprejudiced mind, each proposition can be successfully and overwhelmingly controverted. A careful examination of our shipping industry will show that no other line of business has received as much Government aid as that enjoyed by the shipowners. Since 1884 all materials used in the construction of ships for the foreign trade have been admitted free of duty.

No vessel is permitted to engage in the American coastwise trade unless built in American yards, and this law gives to American shipbuilders an absolute monopoly of the coasting trade. This tonnage will annually equal 5,000,000 tons. The United States Government requires all of its naval vessels to be built in American yards, and the present Congress is asked to appropriate $100,000,000 to the Navy Department to be used in the construction of ships. It will thus be seen that no other industry has been the recipient of so many favors at the hands of our Government as the American shipbuilder and shipowner; but he is not satisfied.

It is but a repetition of the history of subsidies; the more favors an industry receives at the hands of the Government the more it will ask. When once the recipient of Government favors, when once a beneficiary at the expense of the public Treasury, the appetite can never be satisfied. Before I begin to discuss, however, either of the three propositions contended for by the majority, I wish to compare some of the features of this bill with the bill debated at length during the session of the last Congress.

The present bill provides that all of the vessels now in existence, both sail and steam, shall be entitled to the subsidy named, and the owners of such vessels are not required to build and operate additional ships in order to secure the subsidy. Consequently it can not be said that the prime purpose of this measure is to increase our merchant marine. If the majority of the committee had any such purpose in view they would certainly have provided that the owners of ships engaged in the foreign trade before being permitted to avail themselves of the subsidy fixed in the bill should build, register, and put in operation new ships. The rate of subsidy in the present bill is not so high as that fixed in the bill we had before us last Congress, but there is no limit as to how long it shall last or what sum it may reach in the end.

The limit in the bill of last session was fixed at $9,000,000 per annum. The present bill fixes no limit, but the amount of the subsidy each year will depend upon the extent of our foreign trade, and as to how long it will run is a question left entirely with future Congresses. When Congress undertakes to provide that the owners of all vessels now in existence and engaged in the foreign trade of the United States shall draw from the Government a large subsidy to aid such owners in carrying on their private business without compelling such owners to build other ships to correspond in tonnage capacity with those ships drawing the subsidy, such legislation can not possibly result in any great increase in the merchant marine; such legislation is in the interest of those now owning ships and not likely to lead to any increase in our merchant marine.

If the friends of this bill are supporting the measure for the purpose of encouraging shipbuilding and increasing our merchant marine, why did they not provide that such owners of vessels engaged in our foreign trade, before receiving the benefit of the subsidy provided in this bill, should be required to obligate themselves to build new ships to correspond with those receiving the benefit of the subsidy? If the majority are so anxious to build up the merchant marine, why do not they say to the shipowners engaged in our foreign trade, before you shall go into the public Treasury and receive aid from the Government you shall at least obligate yourselves to build and put in operation similar ships to those receiving Government aid?

How can the majority sustain the position that the prime object of this bill is to increase our merchant marine and to stimulate shipbuilding in the United States when all vessels, both sail and steam, now in existence are subsidized and permitted to draw from the public Treasury without the owners being required to build other ships to correspond with those receiving the subsidy? This legislation indicates that our friends on the other side of the Chamber are more solicitous about giving aid and encouragement to the owners of ships now in existence than they are to encourage the building and operation of new ships. In this respect the bill before us at the last session of Congress had the advantage of the present bill we are now discussing, for, if I remember correctly, that measure required the owners of such vessels claiming such subsidy to build new vessels equal to 25 per cent of the tonnage of the vessel or vessels receiving the benefit of the subsidy.

That bill also provided that American citizens who own ships sailing under foreign flags, provided a majority interest in such is owned by American capital, shall be entitled to American registry and a division of the subsidy on certain conditions, but, before being permitted to do so, are required to build other vessels of like capacity. They, however, are only entitled to half the subsidy given to American ships flying the American flag. This feature sought to induce American citizens who had put their capital in ships in foreign countries and were sailing them under foreign flags to transfer them to American registry, and to sail them under our flag, provided they would build other ships; but even this feature is left out of the present bill: consequently there is nothing in this bill to encourage shipbuilding and to increase our merchant marine.

Mark you, Mr. President, the pending measure provides that so much shall be paid per gross registered ton. There is nothing in this bill to prevent an empty ship from collecting a full subsidy. Under the bill of last session, before a ship could get a clearance she was compelled to have cargo equal to 50 per cent of her cargo capacity; hence an empty ship could draw no subsidy; but this measure pays on the gross tonnage capacity of a ship, without any reference to the amount of cargo carried. Any bill which provides that an empty ship can draw subsidy will not operate to increase our commerce.

If subsidies can be justified under any circumstances, they should only be paid in proportion to the cargo actually carried. A ship that carries neither corn, wheat, cotton, tobacco, lumber, or any other product of the farm or factory certainly should not be permitted to draw the subsidy. It will not be denied that under this bill an empty ship can draw the subsidy both for the outward and return voyage; then, again, under the bill we are now considering a ship that sails from our ports with a cargo of American goods to a foreign country will receive no more subsidy than a ship of the same size which brings from foreign lands immigrants to this country. If this bill should pass, it should certainly be amended so as to provide that no vessel should be entitled to a subsidy unless she has cleared from a port of the United States with cargo to the amount of 75 per cent of her gross tonnage.

Pass this bill so that a vessel can sail from a port of the United States in ballast and still receive the subsidy, it will receive and deserve the condemnation of all just and fair men. Thus far I have been endeavoring to point out the inequalities of the measure. I will now come to the first proposition contended for by the majority, that we can not at this time build ships as cheaply in the United States as they can be built in foreign countries. I am sure that our shipbuilders will never build them as cheaply as they are built in foreign countries so long as they can come to Congress and get subsidies from the Government to pay them whatever they see fit to ask as the difference between ships built at home and those built abroad. It is only when you bring them into competition with the shipbuilding interests of other countries that they will learn to rely upon their own skill and industry.

Under our navigation laws no vessel not built in the United States is permitted to take American registry. The coastwise trade is kept entirely in the hands of our own people. As to our foreign trading policy it is different. While none but American-built ships by our laws can be admitted to American registry, we have all along permitted vessels built abroad and having a foreign registry to enter our ports from foreign ports and carry our products to foreign countries. In the coasting trade we have no competition, but as to the foreign trade we come into competition with the vessels of the world. Now, what has been our history in building and operating ships? Our country was first settled along the Atlantic coast. Then railroads had not become a factor in the world's commerce.

The speediest and easiest communication was by water. Our country was new; there was an abundance of timber and all the material necessary to the construction of wooden ships. This material cost almost nothing, and brigs, schooners, and sloops were built for our coasting trade. They ventured to cross the seas, and it has been truthfully said that they whitened every harbor in the Mediterranean. These wooden ships were stanch and swift, and our material for the construction of such ships was excellent, abundant, and cheap. While such conditions lasted we had more than our share of the foreign carrying trade; the American clipper beat the world for speed and safety. England paid lower wages to her seamen than we paid, still she could not compete with the wooden ships of America. But the time came when the wooden ship was supplanted by the iron and steel ship, and there was no country in the world where the iron and steel industry had been developed as in Great Britain.

Our people were not aware of the inexhaustible supply of iron ore throughout the United States; we were a new country; we had neither iron nor steel industries; we knew comparatively nothing of the quantity or quality of the raw material hidden in the bowels of the earth; consequently Great Britain took advantage of the situation, built iron and steel ships, and took away from us our foreign carrying trade, and we have never yet regained it. We ceased to give attention to the building and operation of ships for foreign trade when we had neither steel nor iron so as to compete with Great Britain; we turned our attention to clearing up our lands, to building homes and cities, railroads, and other industries absolutely necessary to the development of a new country, and left the shipbuilding industry for foreign trade to other nations; hence other nations caught up the foreign carrying trade of the world.

With this condition of affairs there was one of two things to do—either to amend our navigation laws and permit our citizens to buy ships in the cheapest markets of the world or to grant to them large subsidies, so as to meet foreign competition. But the time has come when conditions have changed. We no longer occupy the disadvantage that has existed for a half century. We have both iron and steel in abundance, and can build iron and steel ships as cheap as any country in the world.

Even admit, for the sake of argument, that we can not furnish the material for the construction of ships as cheaply as Great Britain or Germany; all we have to do is to go into the markets of the world, and we can purchase all of the material we need without paying any customs duties.

If Great Britain can sell steel plates cheaper than the United States, which I deny, then under our tariff laws the shipbuilders can buy all the material they wish without paying a single dollar of tariff taxes; so it will be seen that shipbuilders not only have our own markets to select their material, but if at any time the market should fluctuate and foreign markets should undersell ours, then Congress in its wisdom has said to the shipbuilding interests of the United States, Go where you can get your material the cheapest and you shall be exempt from customs duties, because we are anxious to develop the shipbuilding interests of our country. Where will you find any other private interest the recipient of such favors? But I maintain that it will not be necessary to go elsewhere to procure material to build ships. How can this proposition be sustained?

From what sources shall we gather evidence in support of the contentions of the minority? Let us consult those whose business associations have led them to investigate the cost of the construction of ships in the United States in comparison with other countries. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], in his argument on the floor of the Senate no longer ago than yesterday, said that we could procure in the United States materials for the construction of ships as cheaply as any country could furnish them.

Mr. HANNA. May I interrupt the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. HANNA. That we could procure it where?

Mr. CLAY. That we could furnish it in the United States to our shipbuilders as cheaply as any country could do it.

Mr. HANNA. I should like to have the Senator refer to the RECORD.

Mr. CLAY. I believe if the Senator will refer to the RECORD he will find that the Senator from Maine said on the floor of the Senate that the great trouble was the difference in the cost of labor; that the material could be procured in this country as cheaply as it could in any country in the world.

Mr. HANNA. That is exactly true; and that material is ore in the ground, and nothing else.

Mr. CLAY. I believe all the material necessary for the construction of a ship can be purchased as cheaply in the United States as in any country in the world.

Mr. HANNA. I will ask the Senator——

Mr. CLAY. I desire to say to the Senator from Ohio that we are no longer infants. We are shipping our steel plates and our locomotives and our steel rails to every country in the world, and selling them cheaper there than we are in the United States.

Mr. HANNA. I agree with the Senator that we are no infant; but when he alludes to material, I should like him to define what stage in the progress of manufacture he means by "material."

Mr. CLAY. Manufactured steel is as cheap in this country as in any country.

Mr. HANNA. Does he mean ship plates, beams, angle iron, and material of that character?

Mr. CLAY. I believe all material; and if the Senator will give me his attention I think by the time I get through my remarks I shall have demonstrated to him that we can get the material as cheaply as it can be obtained anywhere in the world.

Mr. HANNA. All right.

Mr. CLAY. Now, let us present the conclusions reached by those capable of making these investigations, and let us see if these conclusions are reliable and trustworthy. Ten years ago Mr. Cramp, the greatest shipbuilder in the United States, set forth in his testimony, which I now have before me, that if the shipbuilding interests of the United States had free raw material they could compete with the world. Mr. John Roach, another great shipbuilder, said, time and again, if Congress will take off the duties from American iron, reducing it to the price of foreign iron, then we are prepared to compete with foreign shipbuilders.

It can not be disputed that the people of our country have the energy, the enterprise, the skill, the material in a larger degree than the shipbuilders of Great Britain. I deny that this country is an infant—an infant in manufacturing, in shipbuilding, or in any other business way. We have capital in abundance; we have harbors, shipyards, and the machinery necessary to compete with any nation in the world, and the Statistical Abstract demonstrates the fact that the exports of the United States find a ready sale in the markets of the world.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. Then why do we not get the ships?

Mr. CLAY. We have ships.

Mr. BURTON. As many as we need?

Mr. CLAY. No, sir. It can be demonstrated at this time that it will take the shipyards of the United States at least from three to four years to catch up with the orders they have on hand, if the naval journals which I have been reading are correct.

The best information I have been able to obtain is that the coasting trade has been exceedingly profitable. It will be found that ship men have put their money into ships where it was absolutely protected from all competition—in the coasting trade—and it has paid from 25 to 30 per cent, and paid more than it would have paid in the foreign trade. That is the reason why the great domestic shipping interests of the United States have prospered to the exclusion of our foreign trade.

Mr. BURTON. One other question. Why not, then, treat the foreign trade the same as we do the coasting trade?

Mr. CLAY. Do you mean to permit no ships except American ships to enter our ports and carry our goods to foreign countries?

Mr. BURTON. I do not mean to say that; not at all; but what I mean is this: Why not extend to them the same kind of protection? I do not mean, of course, to the extent of keeping other ships from our ports, but I mean to carry out the same principle with respect to our ships engaged in the foreign trade.

Mr. CLAY. We do not give a single dollar to our coasting vessels. We give American shipowners the exclusive right to engage in the coasting trade. That is the only aid they receive from the Government. There is no way in the world in which you can justify a subsidy to the foreign trade if the American shipowner is able to compete with the foreign shipowner.

Our consular reports show that the Americans are pushing their way into the British colonies; railroads are built in India with American rails; the American manufacturers export their iron and their machinery to Asia and Europe. In the year 1900 the same reports show that nearly 300 railroad coaches found their way from Jersey City to the land of the Pharaohs.

Europe can no longer compete with the American manufacturer; we are now exporting manufactured products; and, after paying tariff duties, are selling them cheaper in foreign markets than our home markets. Well has it been said that Europe is not safe against the invasion of American goods; Great Britain to-day is buying American locomotives, steel rails, steel plates, railroad coaches, and even coal; Sheffield, once the home of the steel industry, has been dethroned by Pittsburg. With cheap material in abundance, why can not we to-day build ships as cheaply at Bath, San Francisco, Philadelphia, and Newport News as anywhere in the world?

I have before me an article found in the Engineering Magazine of 1898, written by J. Stephen Janes, headed "Future supremacy of the iron markets of the world—The United States v. Europe as a manufacturing competitor." This able and most interesting writer points out the fact that Great Britain is now importing American pig iron, American steel rails, American wire, American agricultural machinery, American machine tools, and many other American products. He also points out the fact that the United States enjoys conditions which are unapproached in Great Britain, but which happen to be at once vital and fundamental. We have the most ample abundance of cheap and high-class ores at an extremely low price.

He points out the further fact that in the Northern States of Michigan, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, commonly spoken of on both sides of the Atlantic as "the Lake Superior region," the American iron trade commands the largest supply of high-class ores known to exist in the whole world, and these ores are mined at a lower cost than is known anywhere else. He points out the various iron and steel industries of the United States, and shows that most of these are conducted automatically by machinery of a novel and ingenious character which British manufacturers hesitate to introduce because of difficulties growing out of labor troubles.

He admits that Great Britain once stood unrivaled as a manufacturing nation, but clearly demonstrates that the economic policy adopted by the United States, and which is often supposed to cramp and fetter invention, did not hinder a band of brilliant engineers and metallurgists from exerting themselves to improve upon British methods and appliances until they have placed American practice far ahead of anything in Europe. He demonstrates conclusively that American methods enable much larger yield to be obtained from a given plant, alike in iron and steel works, and generally at a lower labor cost, and predicts that Great Britain will never again approach or rival American mechanical achievements.

In another article discussing the same subject he makes clear the fact that the nation that can produce the cheapest pig iron is likely, all other things being approximately equal, to be able to secure the leading position as a manufacturing country. The command of cheap pig iron necessarily carries with it the command of cheap materials of construction generally, cheap ships, cheap railways, and cheap tools. A complete revolution has taken place in our country during the last twenty years in our iron and steel industries. When iron and, later, mild steel became the material for ship construction it was not in the nature of things that America would produce them, for the natural laws of industrial development are not to be unduly hurried any more than those governing physical phenomena. The vast mineral interests of our country were unknown.

Mr. HANNA. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. HANNA. I understand that the Senator is reading from an English ironmaster?

Mr. CLAY. No, sir; he is an American.

Mr. HANNA. May I ask the Senator if he reads from him as an authority?

Mr. CLAY. He is an engineer of skill and ability, and is writing for an engineering magazine.

Mr. HANNA. May I inquire further whether the Senator agrees to the argument he offers?

Mr. CLAY. I indorse it.

Mr. HANNA. All right; you indorse it.

Mr. CLAY. I will proceed.

It has only been recently discovered that the United States possesses an iron-making industry equal to that of any country in the world. These conditions are now realized by the British shipowners. In 1890 the president of the Iron and Steel Institute, Sir James Kitson, realizing the true situation, in addressing an American Congress, said:

> The supremacy of our British shipbuilders and our shipping interests is based upon the excellent quality and the abundant supply at moderate prices of steel furnished by our steel makers.

Now, the United States produces more pig iron, the primary raw material of steel, and therefore of ships, than any country in the world, not excluding the United Kingdom. We all know that pig iron, as has been said, is the chief raw material of the shipbuilder. Now, going back a period of thirty years, we find that the production of pig iron in the United States in 1868 was 1,431,250 tons, and during the same year Great Britain produced 4,970,206 tons. Trace the figures still farther: In 1897 the United States produced 9,652,680 tons of pig iron, while the United Kingdom only produced 8,789,455 tons. In 1900 the United States produced 14,000,000 tons of pig iron. It was in the year 1890, twelve years ago, that America forged ahead, and she has kept in the lead ever since in the production of pig iron.

These reasons explain satisfactorily why our steel plates cross the Atlantic to be used by British shipbuilders in the construction of ships. Great Britain realizes the situation, and that her supremacy in the construction and operation of ships is bound to come to an end. And Mr. Archibald B. Head, an English engineer of Westminster, in the early part of this year read an extremely interesting paper on the American iron and steel industry. I do not suppose my friend the Senator from Ohio objects because he is an English engineer. In this valuable contribution the author not only showed to what a remarkable extent the Americans were forging ahead in the iron-making industry, but also gave details of the way in which they gained their end.

Mr. G. R. Dunnell, in a most interesting article written for the Engineering Magazine in 1899, quotes extensively from Mr. Head and points out the fact that many of the advantages which the United States enjoys over Great Britain are the result of physical conditions, but not a few are due to natural characteristics—enterprise and that rare intelligence which makes scientific discovery minister to commercial success through the channel of wise and liberal expenditure. He sums up the net results of all these conditions, and demonstrates that not only pig iron, but manufactured iron and steel, can be produced more cheaply in the United States than in Great Britain.

Mr. Head, the distinguished English engineer, points out that Bessemer ore sold in Pittsburg at 11s. 6d. per ton while the price in Middlesboro was 14s. 9d. Continuing with Mr. Head's figures, we find American coke selling at 6s. 6d. per ton, as against 13s. 6d. for Durham coke. Mr. Head gives steam coal at 3s. per ton, which is much below the prices that rule in England. The distinguished English engineer, as the result of these and other conditions, says that Bessemer pig is produced in America at 40s. per ton, as against 50s. per ton for the Middlesboro pig. After going through these figures he reaches the conclusion that Englishmen should not be surprised to find the price of steel ship plates to be £4 12s. at Pittsburg, as against £5 10s. at Middlesboro.

Mr. HANNA. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. CLAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HANNA. May I ask in what year Mr. Head's quotations were made?

Mr. CLAY. In the year 1899. I am sure the magazine article was written in 1899.

Mr. HANNA. That the price of Bessemer pig in the United States was 40 shillings?

Mr. CLAY. I did not say that.

Mr. HANNA. Will the Senator kindly repeat what he did say?

Mr. CLAY. The distinguished English engineer, as the result of these and other conditions, says that Bessemer pig is produced in America at 40 shillings per ton as against 50 shillings per ton for the Middlesboro pig.

Mr. HANNA. I will answer that to-morrow.

Mr. CLAY. I have the article, and I have the book here.

Mr. HANNA. The reason I wanted to know the date at which that market price was quoted is——

Mr. CLAY. You can have the identical book.

Mr. HANNA. Because it is not true, and I want to have a chance to contradict it.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, realizing the wonderful progress that the United States has made in developing her iron and steel industries, the distinguished Englishman reaches the conclusion that the supremacy which England has so long enjoyed in the production of iron and steel and in the construction of ships must necessarily be transferred to the United States. Mr. Dunnell, in the same interesting and instructive article, admits that there was a time when steamships could be built cheaper in England and Scotland than in America.

This condition no longer exists. Material, as has been shown, has already been made cheaper in the United States, and while labor, on the other hand, is dearer, the distinguished writer says the American has a way of doing things and producing things with dear labor more cheaply than others can with cheap labor, because he substitutes machinery for muscle and employs dear labor where thinking is needed; and he admits that Great Britain has lost the advantage she long held in the lesser cost of steel, and that the United States has overtaken her, and unless Great Britain struggles hard for her own she will even drop to an inferior place among the manufacturing countries of the world.

When we make a comparison as to the cost of steel plates in Great Britain with the United States in 1890, we can readily understand why our exports of steel plates have more than doubled. We are not surprised that the shipbuilders of Great Britain have crossed the Atlantic, left home markets, and purchased in American markets the material out of which to construct their ships. In January, 1900, the price of steel plates in the United States was $58.24, as against $38.88 in Great Britain. In April prices had advanced in Great Britain to $40.70, as against $40.32 in the United States; and in June following the prices of steel plates had gone down to $33.60 in the United States, while in Great Britain they were still selling at $40.70. In August the prices of steel plates had gone to $24.08, while the same plates were selling in Great Britain at $38.88.

Mr. HANNA. What year was that?

Mr. CLAY. That was in 1890, and I will vouch for it myself.

Mr. HANNA. I believe that.

Mr. CLAY. I am glad you do. I am glad the Senator will believe occasionally.

In September following steel plates were selling in the United States at $24.64, as against $38.88 in Great Britain. You believe that, too, I hope?

Mr. HANNA. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. Thank you.

Thus it will be seen that the material out of which ships were being constructed was more than 30 per cent cheaper in the United States than in Great Britain, and doubtless this condition of affairs would have continued had it not been for the organization of the great steel trust. Even now the material for the construction of ships can be purchased cheaper in American than in foreign markets.

In 1891, ten years ago, we only exported 4,436 pounds of steel and iron plates to Great Britain; in 1893, 10,322 pounds; in 1897, 2,116,225 pounds; in 1898, 3,348,280 pounds; in 1899, 31,914,733 pounds; in 1901, 38,326,552 pounds, valued at $596,272. Think of it, the total value of our exports on this line to Great Britain in 1891 was only $232, and ten years later reached the sum of $596,272. In truth it can be said that our iron and steel industries have made such rapid progress that we have successfully invaded even the markets of Great Britain. In January and February of 1901—I will ask the Senator from Ohio again if I am not correct—in January and February of 1901 steel plates were still selling cheaper in the United States than in Great Britain.

Mr. HANNA. Was that owing to the steel trust?

Mr. CLAY. No, sir.

Mr. HANNA. That is the year when the trust was organized.

Mr. CLAY. My dear friend, it had just gone into operation; it hardly started to work.

I will say that during the last year the cost of steel plates has risen in the United States, and they are now selling a few dollars higher here than they are in Great Britain. Steel plates were selling cheaper in the United States than in Great Britain, as I said, in January, 1891.

It is true there now exists a slight difference in favor of Great Britain, which difference unquestionably is attributable to the organization of the great steel trust. During the last fiscal year, as reported by the Bureau of Statistics, the total exports of steel plates and sheets from the United States were 108,380,369 pounds, and valued at $1,752,837. The United States to-day is exporting to the markets of the world the material used in the construction of ships. But, Mr. President, I must not consume so much time in pointing out the indisputable evidences that the United States now produces in abundance material for the construction of ships probably cheaper than any country in the world; for, if the position taken by the majority be even true, which I deny, then our shipbuilders have the privilege of going into the markets of the world and buying the material where they can obtain it at the lowest possible prices without the payment of tariff duties.

Let us now look to the second position taken by the majority, that labor costs more in America than in foreign countries; that the American shipowner pays higher wages to American seamen than the foreign shipowner pays to foreign seamen; that it costs more money to operate a ship in the United States than in foreign countries. This position, the majority tell us, is impregnable. If this position can be successfully disputed, then every possible reason advanced by the majority for the passage of this bill has fallen to the ground. This is the principal reason they give to explain why the United States is such a small factor in the foreign carrying trade of the world.

I propose, Mr. President, to meet the issue fairly, and let us see if the position which the majority assume can be sustained by logic and reason. Under existing law the American shipowner can employ labor in any market where he can procure it cheapest. Section 4519 of the Revised Statutes authorizes every master of a vessel in the foreign trade to engage any seaman at any port out of the United States to serve for one or more round trips from and to the port of departure or for a definite time, whatever the destination, and Mr. Chamberlain, the Commissioner of Navigation, the champion of this bill, tells us in his report of 1894 that the American shipowner is at liberty to employ labor in any market where, on account of its abundance, its quality, or its cost, he finds it to his advantage to do so.

My friend from Ohio was so confident here the other day that I thought perhaps I was mistaken; that we did not employ foreign labor more cheaply than we employ American labor to operate ships. Certainly the Senator from Ohio will not dispute the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, who has furnished a great many facts for the discussion of this bill. Now, what does he say? He tells us that only a small part of the crews of the Indiana, Illinois, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, and Pacific mail steamship companies in Asiatic trade are American seamen; but on the contrary, about four-fifths of their crews come from Liverpool, Antwerp, and Hongkong.

It was disclosed on a hearing before the Committee on Immigration a few days ago that 75 per cent of the crews on the Pacific coast, in our trade with China and Japan, was composed of Chinese, the cheapest labor in the world. As said before, there is no law on our statute books requiring American shipowners engaged in the foreign trade to obtain their crews in American ports. The American shipowner is at liberty to employ either American or foreign seamen, as he may deem to his best interest. The American shipowner has availed himself of this privilege. Go to the Pacific coast and you will find the steamship companies engaged in trade with China and Japan employing labor in those ports where it can be obtained the cheapest. I say to the Senator from Ohio that, from the best information I have, we pay Chinamen there $15 a month, and you pay an American seaman there $28 to $30 a month.

Mr. BACON. And the Chinaman is paid in silver.

Mr. CLAY. That is correct.

If our statutes permit American shipowners engaged in the foreign trade to employ foreign seamen at the lowest possible prices, then how have we lost our foreign-carrying trade on account of high wages? If American shipowners have availed themselves of our laws and have gone to the ports of the world and manned their ships with the cheapest possible labor, then why have they not been able to compete with the foreigner, so far as the question of cheap labor is concerned? If they are permitted to employ the cheapest labor found either in Europe or Asia, and in reality avail themselves of this privilege, then, Mr. President, American shipowners are estopped from saying they pay higher wages than foreign shipowners.

If they employ the identical seamen that Great Britain, Germany, Japan, and other foreign powers employ, then it comes in poor grace to charge that the American shipowner can not compete, so far as wages are concerned, with foreign shipowners. If it be true that the chief impediment in the way of putting the American flag over American trade on the high seas was a question of seamen's wages, this bill provides no effective remedy. If there be a difference in the wages of American and foreign seamen and we determine to pay a bounty to make up such difference, then let this difference be paid to American seamen and not to the American shipowner. This bill offers no encouragement to young men to lead the life of American seamen.

Pass it, and you will see no material change in the wages paid and the class of labor employedi on our ships. The subsidy will not go to American seamen, labor will receive none of the benefits of the bounty, the scale of wages will remain the same, and the shipowner will pocket the subsidy. This bill provides that at the beginning one-fourth of the crews of the subsidized ships shall be citizens of the United States. I believe it can be demonstrated that this feature of the bill can be evaded without the payment of any increased wages. A critical examination of the wages paid American and foreign crews will show that many of the employees receive practically the same wages. Examine the wages paid the entire crew of the fast American liner St. Paul and the fast Liverpool passenger liner Campania, and you will see that more than one-fourth of these crews on the foreign and American lines draw practically the same wages. The crew wages on the American line are, as follows:

Chief officer	$120.00
Second officer	70.00
Third officer	60.00
Fourth officer	40.00
Chief engineer	150.00
First assistant engineer	100.00
Junior first assistant engineer	85.00
Extra first assistant engineer	85.00
Second senior engineer	70.00
Junior second engineer	65.00
Senior third engineer	60.00
Junior third engineer	55.00
Fourth engineer	50.00
Carpenter	50.00
Carpenter's mate	35.00
Boatswain	37.50
Boatswain's mate	27.50
Master-at-arms	25.00
Sailors	25.00

Making the total thus far of the American line, $1,210. Now, take the English line for the same class of employees:

Chief mate	$100.00
First officer	75.00
Second officer	62.50
Extra second officer	55.00
Third officer	50.00
Fourth officer	45.00
Chief engineer	150.00
Senior second engineer	100.00
Second engineer	82.50
Senior third engineer	75.00
Third engineer	72.50
Senior fourth engineer	67.50
Fifth engineer	60.00
Carpenter	40.00
Joiner	37.50
Boatswain	37.50
Boatswain's mate	27.50
Master at arms	22.50
Sailors	23.75

Making the total of $1,211.

The cost thus far of wages is practically the same. Stewards receive the same amount on both American and British ships—$16.25 per month. These figures are taken from the report of the House minority committee, made during the Fifty-sixth Congress, and will be found on pages 22 and 23. In the engine rooms the wages paid on American ships are probably higher than those paid on British ships. Now, how will the shipowners evade this law so as to keep the subsidy themselves instead of paying higher wages? When the shipowner makes up his crew he will employ American seamen for such services as will demand the same wages, whether performed by American or foreign seamen.

In this way he will employ 25 per cent of American seamen without any increased wages. He will have complied with the provisions of this bill. The shipowner will then employ the remainder of his crew—foreign seamen from foreign ports—at the lowest possible prices. What will be the result? Wages will not be increased; no inducements will be offered to American youth to become American seamen; conditions will not be changed, except the American capitalist and American shipowner will have been the sole beneficiary of the money taken from the public Treasury by the provisions of this bill. There has been no effort on the part of the majority to increase the wages of American seamen, to provide for the employment of American seamen to the exclusion of foreign seamen.

The majority have given evidences of a desire to help the shipowner—to advance his financial interest at the expense of the public Treasury—but thus far have not manifested the least interest in advancing the wages of American seamen. Neither does this bill give any encouragement to the young men of America to follow the life of a sailor.

But, Mr. President, I must return to the line of argument I was pursuing in regard to the cost of wages in the operation of ships in the United States in comparison with foreign countries. In order to reach a correct conclusion we must not only examine the price of wages, but the ratio of output to wages, which is the deciding factor in competition. I think it can be demonstrated that the employer in the United States has the advantage over the British employer in the output of wages.

Mr. Mulhall, in one of his latest books, gives the gross earnings per capita of given nations, which are not without indirect interest, and he shows that in the United Kingdom they are nearly 20 per cent less than in the United States, although nearly 33 per cent greater than in some of the European countries, notably Germany. The same distinguished writer tells us that the rate paid wages is no criterion of the relative value, either to employer or worker, that food is cheaper in the United States, that the worker here spends one-sixth of his earnings on food; whereas in Great Britain he spends one-fourth for that purpose. To further illustrate the ratio of production between wages of this country and foreign countries I give the results from the following figures taken from the census returns by a correspondent in the Glasgow Herald.

It was ascertained that the total average value of a year's production in the United States was $6,998, and the total average value of a laborer's production in Great Britain was $4,106.70, and only $2,946 in Germany. The average wages per year of all industries in the United States was $349.92, as against $204.12 for Great Britain and $155.52 for Germany. The comparison did not stop here. The average value of the net production of the wage-earners in each country is given; and what do we find? The average value of each laborer's production in the United States was found to be $1,885.68. The average value of each laborer's production in Great Britain was found to be $792.18, and in Germany was ascertained to be only $544.32. It will thus be seen that the average American laborer not only received more wages than the laborer of foreign countries, but that the output from his labor more than doubled the output of the laborer of Great Britain and more than trebled that of Germany.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I understand the Senator who has the floor does not feel like going on further this evening. Therefore I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CLAY. I could finish in thirty or forty minutes, but I am suffering with my throat, and do not feel like finishing to-night.

Mr. FRYE (Mr. DEPEW in the chair). Will the Senator from Colorado withdraw his motion for an executive session for a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to know whether or not an arrangement can be made for a vote upon this bill and the pending amendments and the amendments that may be offered.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I have conferred with the minority members of the Committee on Commerce, but I have not been able to confer with all of the Senators on this side of the Chamber. The minority members of the Committee on Commerce are willing to agree to a vote on the bill on next Monday week.

Mr. FRYE. At what hour?

Mr. BERRY. At any hour. I would say 3 o'clock, if that be convenient, on next Monday week. I do not know whether there is any Senator on this side who is now absent who would object to such an arrangement, but I will simply say the minority members of the Committee on Commerce are willing to make the agreement proposed, if it is satisfactory to Senators on the other side.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent, then, Mr. President, that the vote may be had on this bill and all pending amendments and all amendments that then may be offered, without debate, at 3 o'clock one week from Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DEPEW in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I do not know that there will be any objection to that proposition; but there are very few Senators on this side of the Chamber now present who have heretofore opposed the bill in its former form; and I will therefore ask the Senator from Maine to postpone his request until there are more members in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. TELLER. I think that is right.

Mr. PETTUS. I have no objection to the proposition being made at any time.

Mr. FRYE. Then I will postpone the request until to-morrow morning.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 4th instant approved and signed the act (S. 219) for the relief of May Chambers, widow of Thomas Chambers.

LOUISIANA PURCHASE EXPOSITION COMPANY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. TELLER, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Industrial Expositions, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State covering a statement showing the receipts and disbursements of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company for the month of January, 1902, furnished by the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Commission, in pursuance of section 11 of the act "to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the purchase of the Louisiana territory," etc., approved March 3, 1901.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, March 5, 1902.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. TELLER. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 5, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by Rev. LEE S. MCCOLLESTER, of Detroit, Mich., as follows:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, the Keeper and Leader of all our spirits, we pray Thee that as Thy children we may thoroughly understand that Thou art the giver of all life and hope. We ask Thee that Thou shalt inspire us with ideals of duty, honor, and of righteousness. We pray Thee that Thou shalt give us strength and courage, that we may be true to these ideals; that through us, Thy servants, we may do that service in private and in public that may enable our nation to take its place as a leader among the nations of men, fulfilling our mission in wisdom and in righteousness.

O Father, as Thou hast seen fit to take from this House by death a member from Pennsylvania, we pray Thee that Thy comfort may come into his family, and that the remembrance of him may stimulate us all to seek comfort from Thee, Thou who givest and Thou who takest away. So lead us and keep us that in the spirit of the Christ we may come nearer to Thee, our God and Father. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up for consideration the report of the conferees on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses on the pension appropriation bill. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the report be dispensed with, and that the statement of the House conferees be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BARNEY] calls up the conference report on the pension appropriation bill. Under the order made yesterday morning, the reading of the report is dispensed with, and the statement will be read.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8581) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"And provided further, That hereafter no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for services rendered in securing the introduction of a bill, or the passage thereof through Congress, granting pension or increase of pension; and any person who shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain any compensation for such services shall be deemed guilty of an offense, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every such offense, be fined not exceeding $500, or imprisoned not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court."

And the Senate agree to the same.

S. S. BARNEY,
H. C. VAN VOORHIS,
JNO. C. BELL,
Managers on the part of the House.
J. H. GALLINGER,
J. C. PRITCHARD,
GEO. TURNER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 8581) making appropriations for the payment of pensions, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report, namely:

In lieu of the matter inserted by the Senate amendment, the following is recommended to be inserted, namely:

"And provided further, That hereafter no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for services rendered in securing the introduction of a bill or the passage thereof through Congress granting pension or increase of pension; and any person who shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain any compensation for such services shall be deemed guilty of an offense, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every such offense, be fined not exceeding $500, or imprisoned not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court."

S. S. BARNEY,
H. C. VAN VOORHIS,
JNO. C. BELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Speaker, if no further explanation is desired, I move that the report be adopted and ask the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves the adoption of the conference report and asks the previous question on his motion.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If the gentleman will withhold that for a moment I would like to ask a question.

Mr. BARNEY. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I would like to have a brief explanation upon the subject of the provision which denies the right of pension attorneys to act, soliciting legislation in Congress.

Mr. BARNEY. If no objection is made, I will at this time gladly make a brief explanation of this proposed amendment. It is not designed to interfere with the action of honest pension attorneys who are doing honest service for the old soldiers, but it is designed to prevent them from going around the country and writing to and inducing old soldiers to employ them to render services or pretended services in the introduction and passage of bills in this House. I take it that no effort on the part of attorneys is necessary for that purpose, and that any member of this House is always ready to introduce a bill when it is presented to him by the old soldier himself, with a proper statement of his claims and it appears to be worthy. Now, knowledge has come to the members of this committee that some attorneys in this country, or so-called attorneys, some men who claim they are assisting the old soldiers, are writing to members of this House, or inducing others to write, to introduce bills, and that as soon as those bills are introduced they ask and receive a fee for that service.

I think that many members of this House will bear me out in the statement that they have received very many letters from old soldiers asking them to introduce bills, and added in the letter or as a postscript to it is a request that as soon as that bill is introduced a copy be sent them; and we are told that the object of that is that these men who are soliciting these things get a fee for doing that. Doubtless these letters are written by these solicitors. We are told that some six or seven thousand bills have been introduced in this House this session already, and probably many more have been introduced in the Senate. It is probable that not more than one-quarter or less than that of those bills will ever be considered here, and we are inclined to think that very many of them are introduced on account of the action of these men whom we seek to cut off by this amendment. It is not designed to in any way cut off or abridge the introduction or consideration of deserving bills, but it is designed to stop the solicitation for a consideration of the introduction of bills which stand no chance of being considered and which never are considered here.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I would suggest to the gentleman, in view of the statement that there have been so many thousand bills introduced for private pensions in this House, it looks to me as if they proceed in this provision upon the theory that the general Pension Bureau gives relief generally to soldiers that is ample for their protection, and that very few private bills should be introduced in the House.

Mr. BARNEY. That, I would say, is the common judgment. That is, that this House should only consider such cases as are indeed special. In such cases I am heartily in their favor.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin permit a question?

Mr. BARNEY. Certainly. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas for a question.

Mr. KLEBERG. Was this amendment added in the conference committee?

Mr. BARNEY. The principal part of the amendment was placed upon the bill by the Senate, but that amendment only provided a penalty for rendering services for a compensation in the passage of the bill, but in the conference committee we added, also, a provision making it applicable to the introduction of bills.

Mr. KLEBERG. I think it is a very necessary amendment, and there should not be any objection to it.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. BARNEY. Certainly.

Mr. CORLISS. I would like to ask if the gentleman does not think that it would be wholesome legislation to pass a general law of this character to prohibit anyone from using influence in circulating petitions or writing letters to members of Congress with reference to any character of legislation?

Mr. BARNEY. Well, we are going part way in that direction by this amendment, although I would not wish to deny any American citizen the right to petition Congress. This law, however, in no way limits that right.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We do not want any general legislation on that subject.

Mr. KEHOE. I want to ask my friend from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] if he does not think his proposition would be clearly unconstitutional, in that it would prohibit the right of people to petition Congress?

Mr. CORLISS. I do not understand that this is a denial of the right of petition. This makes a misdemeanor of an act which is certainly very detrimental to the interests of the people, and if it is constitutional with reference to pension bills it is constitutional with reference to cable bills and sugar bills and other measures about which we are constantly annoyed by pettifoggers soliciting communications from the public to influence the members.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BARNEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REDEMPTION OF INTERNAL-REVENUE STAMPS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back the Senate amendments to the bill H. R. 6570, an act to amend the act of May 12, 1900, authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to redeem or make allowance for internal-revenue stamps. If I can make a brief statement to the House, I want to ask unanimous consent that the amendments of the Senate be disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, calling up the bill H. R. 6570, with Senate amendments, asks unanimous consent that the House disagree to the amendments of the Senate and ask for a conference.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the bill about?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman that this is the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the bill about?

Mr. PAYNE. It is a bill extending the time for the redemption of internal-revenue stamps. The law provided that they must be presented for redemption within two years after their purchase.

It was found that there were many stamps in the hands of innocent parties who purchased them more than two years before they presented them to the department for redemption. We extended the time. The Senate seeks to restrict the classes of cases in which this redemption may take place.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am only too glad to help you pass it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House, Mr. PAYNE, Mr. DALZELL, and Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

MISSOURI AND MERAMEC WATER COMPANY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 2977) authorizing the Missouri and Meramec Water Company to take water from the Missouri River, and to construct and maintain a dam or other devices for that purpose.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Missouri and Meramec Water Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Missouri, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to draw, by canal, flume, or race, from the Missouri River, at or near a point about 8 miles above Creve Coeur Lake, in the county of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, such supply of water as may be necessary or required for the purposes of said corporation, and to discharge said water at a point on the Meramec River in the neighborhood of Meramec Highlands, in the county of St. Louis and State of Missouri; also to erect, construct, operate, and maintain for that purpose such dams (including a weir dam in the Missouri River at the head of said canal), regulating devices, locks, and other structures and improvements as may be required: Provided, That such withdrawal and discharge at any time of water shall not be so great as to interfere with the navigation of said Missouri or Meramec River: And provided further, That said corporation shall submit detailed plans showing the location and method of constructing said dams, devices, locks, and other structures and canal to the Secretary of War for his consideration and approval, and until the plans and location of the work herein authorized, so far as they affect the navigation of said rivers, shall have been approved by the Secretary of War they shall not be commenced or built.

SEC. 2. That unless the work herein authorized be commenced within one year and completed within five years from the date hereof the privileges granted shall cease and determine.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. There is a similar House bill favorably reported by the House committee.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this Senate bill be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill is in order. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BARTHOLDT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. BARTHOLDT, the similar House bill (H. R. 9524) was ordered to lie on the table.

CUSTOMS INSPECTORS, DISTRICT OF HURON, MICH.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Ways and Means was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7651) to provide for additional compensation for deputy collectors and inspectors of customs for the district of Huron, Mich., etc., and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

HIRAM CRONK.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1796) for the relief of Hiram Cronk, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio what the Senate amendment is?

Mr. BROMWELL. It merely changes the title. It does not change the bill at all.

The motion was agreed to.

PENROSE W. REAGAN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1939) granting an increase of pension to Penrose W. Reagan, with Senate amendments thereto.

The Senate amendments were read.

On motion of Mr. SULLOWAY, the Senate amendments were concurred in.

BENJAMIN BRITTINGHAM.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 5863) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin Brittingham, with Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. This completes matters on the Speaker's table.

RURAL FREE-DELIVERY SERVICE.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11728.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11728.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what is the difference in time at present?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has used one hour and fourteen minutes more than the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY] fifteen minutes.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration here to-day is a measure that I can not concur in.

The change proposed is to have the rural-delivery carriers now in the service and those to be appointed in the future come under the contract system. All routes are to be advertised and let out to the lowest bidder. We had an experience of this kind under the old star-route system. This system became very unpopular. If there is any reason why this plan should work any better in the rural-delivery service, I do not know it.

It is urged in favor of this new plan that the routes are unequal. True, but so are those in our large cities. If we are to change the system in the rural communities, why not in the cities? Twenty years ago or so I became interested in rural free delivery and wrote many an article for publication in favor of it. One of the main points I urged was that I could see no reason why the country towns should not be treated as well as the cities. The farmer was as much entitled to his mail every day as the merchant. The present rural-delivery service has brought this about, and the country towns and the cities are treated more nearly alike. To place the rural carriers under the contract system, as proposed by this bill, would discriminate between the cities and the country again, and I for one am opposed to it. Both are entitled to equal consideration.

I am of the decided opinion that the present system should be adhered to. It has worked well thus far. Few complaints are heard; not as many as one would naturally expect in starting a new service. I sincerely hope that there will be no such change as proposed by this bill. The rural carrier system is in its infancy; let us make haste slowly in proposing changes.

I can see no immediate necessity for a change now. Give the poor man a chance at these routes at a salary, and as long as he properly performs his duties keep him in the service. These carriers have worked hard (some of them, at least) to build up their routes, and they now begin to see daylight ahead in increased business. They have paid for their outfits. They do errands on their routes and receive pay for the same. The better they serve the people in delivering the mails the more willing the patrons will be to give them a chance to increase their small pay by doing errands for them.

Now, the bill before us proposes to take away the routes from these carriers, who have struggled so hard to build them up and who are working in harmony with the postmasters to make the service a success, and give them to anyone who may happen to be the lowest bidder. It proposes to make the rural carriers contractors instead of, as under the present system, officials of the Post-Office Department and servants of the people. Our experience with the star routes has proved that these contractors are not as near to the people as those who are directly connected with the Department, who take an interest in their daily work and try to do it well.

The gentleman from California speaks of the question of expense, and seems to fear that the rural free-delivery service is going to ruin this Government and swamp the Department. This is the old argument used as long ago as when free delivery in the cities was first started. I remember in the early sixties, when I was postmaster at New Haven, I assisted in inaugurating the system of free delivery, with boxes, etc. One day a gentleman of intelligence and standing came into my office and asked if it were true that I intended to saddle this great expense upon the Government right in the midst of a war. I told him yes. "Mr. SPERRY," he replied, "you ought to be hung." I told him that in twelve months the service would pay for itself. And it does to-day. The free-delivery service is one of the greatest sources of revenue to the Government. It stands to reason that people will write more letters when they have all the conveniences and do not have to tramp a mile or more to the post-office to mail them.

This is an example of how free delivery worked. Why would it not be the same with rural free delivery? Look at Carroll County, Md., near by here. Something like a year and a half ago I was present at a banquet to commemorate the starting of free rural delivery in that county. The Department had selected this county for experimental purposes, and the whole county was covered with rural free delivery. At the time of the banquet I speak of, the service had been running for six months, and it paid for itself, after abolishing all the unnecessary little post-offices, within about $230. To-day I am informed it is entirely self-supporting. That is what we are coming to. When this system is running as the Department expects to have it, it will pay for itself on account of the increased business it will bring. Such has been the history of free delivery, and the records thus far show that rural delivery will do the same.

I always like to side with my committee, but in this matter I find myself unable to agree with the majority of it. I have not signed the majority nor the minority report, but I reserved the right to vote and act as my judgment dictated.

So long as the present system of rural delivery works well why change it for another, especially when the Post-Office Department do not ask it? Nor do they wish a change in this branch of the service. From my own State I find the postmasters, who ought to know what is best for their own localities, are not favorable to the proposed change. I think you will find the same conditions prevail in other States. All the officials in the Post-Office Department take pride in serving their patrons properly. Hence they want no change at present. Let well enough alone.

Ever since I have been in Congress there have been before the Post-Office Committee three bills for the classification of the employees of the Post-Office Department. The bills are just and proper. They do not propose any radical changes, and they should be enacted into law by Congress. Yet we have not been able to properly consider them; while this bill, which proposes to revolutionize the rural-delivery service, is now pressed upon Congress. I fail to see the justice or even necessity of such a change. There is no demand for it, so far as I can learn. On the contrary, I feel sure that should the change proposed by this bill be made you would hear a storm of protests from all over the country.

I appeal to the members on this floor not to disturb the rural-delivery service until there is a demand for it. It has taken us some twenty years to get the service started. It is now in a fair way to become a success. It is popular with the people. Keep it so, and the only way to do this is by maintaining the close relations existing between the patrons of the post-office and the Post-Office Department. The contract system will do away with this relationship, will place the system beyond the absolute control of the Department in one sense, and may cause it no end of embarrassment.

To show you how the people of my district feel about rural free delivery, let me quote to you from a letter just received from a rural carrier. He says, among other things:

I had an awful time getting around during the blizzard that we had last month, but I plunged out and only missed one day. The town did well by me. They got men out with cattle to break the roads, and Tuesday I had eight yoke of cattle and one pair of horses ahead of me most all day.

Would the people do that for a contractor? I think not. For, as the service now is, the people feel that they have a part in it. It belongs to them, and they take an interest in it which they would not if a private individual had secured the right to deliver the mails by contract.

My record of twenty-eight years in the postal service had taught me something about post-office matters. I am in favor of any improvements that are really demanded and would be of benefit to the service, but the change proposed by this bill is not demanded, nor would it be of benefit to the postal service, in my judgment.

The statements so often made by certain gentlemen on this floor since this debate commenced, that the principles involved in this bill are most momentous and if the bill does not go through the result will be disastrous—these are but the statements of those who use them to try to frighten those opposed to the bill and bring them into submission.

Rural free delivery has been in operation for some three or four years, and yet the Government shows no signs of bankruptcy, weakness, or ruin, as predicted by those who would like to see this bill pass. On the contrary, this country grows stronger and stronger as the years roll by, and the Post-Office Department, notwithstanding the fact that rural free delivery is in full operation, still serves the people with messages of business, peace, and mercy. Instead of the ruin and devastation predicted by those who favor this bill if it does not pass, our steps are firm, our bodies upright, and we fear not for the future. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SWANSON. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the Government up to this time has been engaged in the experiment of delivering the mail by carrier system to the rural population of the country. This bill will fix it as a permanent part of the Post-Office Department. I do not think this is a bill that we should consider with any degree of feeling, either political or personal. It involves the great business Department of the Government. The Post-Office Department does not stand in the same position or occupy the same attitude toward the Government that the other great departments do. The Post-Office Department has nothing whatever to do directly with the governmental features of the Government. It is a business enterprise that was undertaken by the Government, as an individual would undertake a business enterprise, and it ought to be run upon strictly business principles.

Now the question, and the real question, I think, involved in this bill is, What are the best business principles to apply to this system in order to run it economically and at the same time efficiently? I have heard a great deal of talk on the floor of this House and in private conversation with members. Of course it is natural that members of this House, all of whom occupy political positions, receiving their offices from political parties, should be governed in their views and in their wishes more or less from the political aspect of questions that come before Congress. I have heard it said that these rural carriers will build up a system that will control the politics of the country. Now, it is not possible, in my judgment, that you can consider this question along party lines, that there can be any material influence exercised by these carriers—I mean between the great contending parties.

We all know that when a political campaign comes on we do not go to men whose services are worth $50 or $60 a month to convince the voter as to what his duties are toward the Government. The ablest, strongest, and best men of our country go out on the hustings; they go to the homes of the people in the various districts of the United States and argue with them and present the cause of each party and plead for their votes; and this we know, that when you get down to changing the vote between one party or the other party—between a Democrat or a Republican—it is very few votes comparatively that are changed in any one election; so that I say it seems to me nearly absurd to say that a lot of men who are willing to dispose of their services to the Government for $50 or $60 a month can materially affect the politics of this country.

Of course, I admit that in conventions or in party primaries, where it is merely a question of individual choice between voters and no great political principles are involved, that an active, bright, rural carrier might be very serviceable to his friends; but that is not because he occupies the position of a carrier; it is the ability of the man in the end. I know numbers of men in my district that I could get to put on a rural route who would be perfectly efficient and capable of carrying a route and attending to the business that can not make a political vote for me from one end of that route to the other; and I know of men who could ride the same route in one day and do more good among the people along the road than the carrier can do who rides it every day in the year. So that I do not think that the question should be considered with any reference to politics. I do not think, when this great question is involved, that the members of this House can afford to determine this question on political principles, as to whether our party is going to be injured or the other party is going to be injured through having the contract system or the present system.

There are really two questions involved, and only two questions, to decide this case properly. One is as to the cost of the system and the other is as to the efficiency of the system. That is all that I can see involved in the case. We are not acting fairly to our constituents if we determine this question as to our own political fortunes. We are the guardians of the Treasury of the United States, and the members of this House should decide this question as to how it will affect the Treasury of the United States and the appropriations that are to be paid by the people and at the same time render them the most efficient service.

Now, as to cost, the present system is in force with some 8,000 rural carriers. These men are required to furnish a buggy, two horses, and drive an average of 25 miles a day to deliver the mail. For that work they receive the sum of $600 a year, $50 a month. I say that efficient service can not be rendered at any less figure by men competent to do the work. You can not get a man who is competent to properly carry on the business of a post-office—for that is what a rural carrier really is—you can not get a man to give his entire day's time to his work and furnish two horses and a wagon and carry the mail, and do it efficiently, for less than $600, what it is being done for now, and what we propose to put in this bill as a permanent system.

Ah, but the gentlemen opposed to the proposition of maintaining the present system say, "Yes; we do not deny that this system is being carried on to-day as cheaply and as reasonably as we could carry it on under the contract system." I have not heard any denial of that proposition. "But," they say, "when the carriers are organized they will force their salaries up; they will come to the individual member of Congress and tell him that he must raise their salaries, and that they will raid the public Treasury, and that this system will cost an enormous sum of money to the Government."

Well, I say, Mr. Chairman, that when the time comes that I must stand on this floor and confess that for political reasons alone my constituency, or a portion of my constituency, can drive me to put my hand into the Federal Treasury and take out money that they are not entitled to and give to them, then the hour has come when my constituency should recall my commission and send some one else here to occupy my seat.

Mr. SIMS. What about the ship-subsidy fellows; are they not making the attempt; are they not asking the members of Congress to put their hands into the public Treasury and pay them a large bonus?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have had a number of my constituents ask me to vote for the subsidy bill. I do not believe in the bill, and I have told them that I would not vote for the proposition. I think every other gentleman here on this floor who does not believe it is a proper bill will vote against it. I confess that I have a great deal of confidence in the integrity, the standing, and the honor of members of this House. I do not believe the members of this House can be induced to do what is wrong for ulterior motives, for their own benefit.

Mr. SIMS. But if they exercise influence enough in your district, they can retire you and put another man in your place who will do it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have a higher regard for my constituency than to believe that any set of $50-a-month men can turn the balance of my constituency and put a man here from my district who will rob the Federal Treasury.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understand the gentleman's position in opposition to the bill is based upon the theory that partisanship is not used in the country, nor can it be used under the present system since February 1?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I have not gone that far. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understood the gentleman to leave the political feature out of the question. I would like to ask him whether he considers the service sufficiently safeguarded so it can not be used for political purposes in doubtful and close districts of the North and East.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not at present think that there are sufficient safeguards around it, and I will presently come to that question.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DINSMORE. I would like to ask my friend from Alabama, putting aside the matter of his own independence, which I concede to him as a member of the House, whether he does not recognize it as a fact that the House and the Congress of the United States often do yield to the demand of citizens at home—their constituents—put their hands into the Treasury, and take out money that is not justifiable?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I think sometimes this House becomes extravagant, as all individuals become extravagant at times. But I do say that I do not believe the majority of the men on the floor of this House are induced to be extravagant by motives which look to their own advantage.

Mr. DINSMORE. But it may not be for their personal advantage.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, that is the question here. It is said members of this House can not stand up against these carriers, because they will be afraid of getting defeated if they do. I do not believe the carriers can bring any pressure of that kind to bear on the great bulk of the members of this House.

Mr. DINSMORE. I think the objection extends further than the statement of the gentleman from Alabama would imply. The danger is that these men may form themselves into a political organization which will be effective upon the membership of this House, not with respect to the interests of the members personally, but as to other matters.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I have said, I do not believe the people of the districts can be controlled along political lines by these men; nor do I believe that an organization of that kind could be effective enough to make a Representative violate what he believes to be his duty to his constituency.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman has recently seen passed in this House a bill called the oleomargarine bill upon which members did vote against their own convictions in response to the demand of their constituents.

Mr. KLUTTZ. The gentleman may have voted against his own convictions, but he has no right to charge other members with having done so.

Mr. SIMS. I meant no offense, but I could, if necessary, give the names of members who, in voting on that bill, did yield their own opinions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So far as the oleomargarine bill is concerned, I voted against it myself. But that was not a question of going to the Federal Treasury and taking out money that belonged to our constituents. It was a question whether members would do what their constituents believed ought to be done, where the personal character or motive of the members was not concerned. But here the contention is that the members of this House have not the courage, the strength of character, to stand up against a pressure of this kind.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HILL. I ask that the gentleman's time may be extended. I want to ask him a question.

Mr. SWANSON. I will yield the gentleman from Alabama five minutes more if he wishes to occupy the time himself, but I do not care to yield for these questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has the floor for five minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. Allow me to make an explanation of a remark which I did not intend to be offensive to any of my fellow-members. I did not mean to say that gentlemen here voted for the oleomargarine bill wrongfully. I hold that constituents have a right to instruct their Representatives, who must vote according to what they understand to be the wish of their constituents.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And our constituents have the right to instruct us by letters as well as in any other way.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not care to go further into any questions of that kind.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one other question, I think, involved in this case—that is the question of efficiency. I believe that is the real question to be determined here.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana rose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not yield any further for interruptions.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I thought the gentleman was going to answer my proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am coming to the question of efficiency right now.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. My inquiry did not relate to the question of efficiency, but to political partisanship.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, as to political partisanship, I will say that I believe the existing system, to some extent, is not now controlled sufficiently to keep out partisan influences; and if you put this service under the contract system you can not keep out partisanship on the part of the contract carrier. When a contract carrier is appointed he will be controlled by the partisan politics of the man who aids him in getting the contract, just in the same way that the carrier who works under the present system may be controlled by the man who helps him get his appointment.

But the difference is this: When you have a carrier appointed under the present system, you can enact laws or rules and regulations to control him; whereas when you have a contract carrier, after he signs his bond and enters upon the work of delivering the mail according to his contract, you have no control whatever over him. He can carry political documents; he can make political speeches; he can do what he pleases in such matters, and can tell the Congress of the United States or the Postmaster-General that it is none of their business; that he is carrying out his contract and proposes to do what he pleases in respect to other matters.

As to the contract system, let me say that if the contract system is a desirable method of mail delivery, it is just as reasonable to say that we should put the whole Post-Office system under contract. Whether that should be done or not is simply a business proposition. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States that would prevent us from doing so. If we wish to adopt the contract system, there is no reason why we can not, under a law which we may pass, put an advertisement in the newspapers to-morrow offering the postal service of the United States to the lowest bidder. The telegraph system is carried on by private corporations and carried on efficiently. We can let out the whole business of the Post-Office Department, if we wish, to the lowest bidder. Do you want to do it?

In your town or my town, if you want to adopt that policy, there is nothing to prevent you from saying that in the city of Washington we will call for bids for a man who will run the Post-Office Department of the city of Washington according to the present plan, and give it to the lowest bidder, and he can hire the carriers and the messengers and the people that do the service in the post-office here; and I have no doubt that if you will offer the post-office of the city of Washington to the lowest bidder you will have the work done cheaper than the Government can do it, but will you have it done as efficiently? No; you will not, and you know you will not.

I would like to see a business man on the floor of this House who would hire his clerks and employees in his store by a contract system. Where is the great business house in this country that may have a hundred clerks employed that will say to somebody: Here, we have got so many goods to sell, and we want so many clerks, and we will let it out by contract to the lowest bidder who will put in those clerks and sell our goods to our customers? Why, it is absurd. It is simply absurd.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SWANSON. I yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, it is not a pleasant task for me, a new member, to oppose a proposition formulated by one of the committees of this House, but my interest in the rural free-delivery service is so great, I see in it so much of accomplished fact and so much more of possibility that I can not quietly acquiesce in a measure which, in my humble judgment, would cripple its usefulness if not imperil its success. Before another summer rolls by there will be more than 100 of these rural free-delivery routes winding their way through the valleys and over the hillsides of my district. I know something of the communities through which these routes will pass. I know something of the 10,000 families which they will serve. And I stand here representing not merely the 100 carriers on them, but rather the 50,000 people they will serve, to protest against the provision of this bill which would take from the hands of the accredited servants and agents of the Government the work of carrying the mail on these routes and put it into the hands of the contractors who are the lowest bidders.

The distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] urges the adoption of the contract system for these rural routes from the standpoint of political expediency. He says that up to this time the service has been a political question, and he fears for the political future of the members of this House if the present method of selecting and paying these carriers is continued. When last month this House was considering the question of increasing slightly the pay of these rural letter carriers, he pictured to us the horrors of his nightmare, when he saw an army of 250,000 letter carriers marching, like Coxey's army, upon the Capitol, camping in the shadow of the great Dome, and calling upon the members of this House to surrender unconditionally to its demands for larger salaries or suffer ignominious defeat in the next Congressional campaign. He even went so far as to figure out just what proportion these carriers "and their sisters and their cousins and their aunts" would bear to the rest of the population. And before he had finished his jeremiad he made it plain that his single impulse was to gather us lone and friendless Congressmen under the protection of the contract system, even as a hen gathers her chickens under her wing.

Well now, Mr. Chairman, if this question was to be decided from the standpoint of mere political expediency, I for one would promptly align myself on the side of those who are in favor of maintaining the present method of administering this great and growing service. For when it comes to a question of mere political expediency, that is always the wisest course which secures for one's constituents the best real and apparent results. And no one questions for a moment the proposition that the present method is the best one for both patrons and carriers. In the sphere of mere political expediency results count. Your motive may be ever so pure, your intentions ever so good; you may reach out ever so yearningly for the ideal and the unattainable, but in the sphere of mere political expediency it is "dollars to doughnuts" every time in favor of the man who acts, who does, who achieves. Ever since the time of St. Paul works as well as faith have been demanded in both religion and politics.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is no foundation for the apprehension of the gentleman from California of the malign influence of these carriers when they have become multiplied and have organized themselves into associations. Perhaps I ought not to speak of the carriers in other districts. I know the carriers in my district; I know them to be good citizens and worthy men. They are my neighbors, my friends, my fellow-citizens, and I have no fear of their ever undertaking to undermine me because of my failure to cooperate with them in securing an increase of compensation. I shall stand ready to cooperate with them for this purpose so long as they are not reasonably compensated for the service they render.

Right here, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the question has been raised on this floor as to how far the order lately issued by the Executive forbidding public officials attempting to influence Congressmen in their behalf prohibits the free communication of our people with their Representatives in Congress. I want to say that I do not understand that the order in question undertakes to regulate the conduct of the people of a district toward their Representatives. I want to say most emphatically that the rural letter carriers in my district, and all other citizens of my district, understand that so long as I remain their Representative they will have the fullest right and liberty to address me either in person or in writing, by letter or petition, individually or collectively, upon any subject in which they are interested. [Applause.]

They know that as long as I am their Representative every matter which they call to my attention will be considered patiently, carefully, and thoroughly; that when I can properly do so I will do all in my power to carry out their wishes. I believe that the laws affecting the railway mail clerks and the fourth-class postmasters should be revised, and I have been glad to hear from some of these clerks and these postmasters in my district during the last few weeks. They know the needs of the service, and the information which they have given me has been of great help to me. The value of this rural service to me in my official position as the Representative of my district is no slight matter, for it brings me into far closer contact with a very large proportion of my constituents by enabling them to communicate with me so much more readily.

But, Mr. Chairman, suppose that these carriers undertook to arraign themselves against a member of this House? Of course I can not speak for the constituents of the other members, but I wish to say that if the Representative of my district should at any time be opposed by its carriers when receiving reasonable compensation, on the ground that that Representative had not used due effort to secure for them an increase of pay, that Representative might be defeated, but it would not be because of that opposition, but in spite of it. So long as I enjoy the confidence of the 50,000 patrons of these routes in my district, the 100 carriers on them can not do me any political harm, and when I lose the confidence of those patrons I shall be retired regardless of the feeling of the carriers for me. [Applause.]

The gentleman from California, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, does not understand these rural communities. The people of my district certainly do not deserve the characterization he has given to these communities. They are no rabble such as he describes—unstable as the wind; liable to be led hither and yonder by every demagogue who rises before them, by everyone who calls for vengeance because of some personal grievance. The great majority of them could give the gentleman from California points on all the great questions now before us. They are identified with and interested in the welfare, the progress, the development of the Union; they belong to that class of citizens who, by their resolute independence, their devotion to the best interests of State and Union, have given my little State a prestige in national affairs out of all proportion to its size. They know the value of this rural free delivery; they know the value of the service of the carrier who, in storm and sunshine, in summer's heat and winter's cold, through snow and mud, day after day brings to the door the daily paper and the letter from the boy working his way in some distant place. No one knows the value of this service as they do. They know it a great deal better than does the gentleman from California, and they will be content when, and only when, these carriers get from the Government a reasonable compensation for their service.

So I brush aside all this talk about political expediency—about this army of carriers disturbing the members of this House or organizing against the members of this House. The constituencies of our great cities—one of which the gentleman from California so ably represents—may be composed of the class he describes, but the rural communities are not so composed. Through all the years of the past this great Republic has leaned for help and strength on these rural communities, and not upon the seething masses of the great cities. [Applause.] So I ask you to give to these rural communities the best type of this service, the best administration of this service; for if they are entitled to the service at all, they are entitled to its very best administration. If it is a question of cost, if this great Republic can not afford the service, root it out and have done with it. But if this great country can afford it, if it is best for this great Republic to continue this service, then develop it along the right lines—administer it in the interest of the millions for whom it was established.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the change proposed by this bill is not wise at this time. I believe that nearly everyone who has watched the development of this service through its formative period—through its experimental stage—admits that the idea of the service was conceived in wisdom, and that it has been wrought out with consummate skill, wise judgment, and rare discretion. It has become one of the great institutions of government, of education, of progress; a potent means of drawing together and binding together the rural communities of our country. Under these circumstances, even if no change had been made in the personnel of the Post-Office Department, we might insist that the wise course would be not to make a change at this time, but to leave the service in the hands of those who are most familiar with this subject, its possibilities, its requirements.

It would certainly be wise for us to follow the advice of those who have brought the system to its present degree of efficiency. But a new Postmaster-General has lately been installed in the Post-Office Department. He is a gentleman who merits the reputation he enjoys of being a great organizer. I submit that in view of the fact that every official who has in the past come into contact with the service, every official who during that time has been charged with its management, insists that it would be unwise at this time to make the change provided for in this bill, the new administration in the Post-Office Department should be given at least another year in which to consider the question whether any better method can be devised for carrying the mail over these routes. [Applause.]

I regret that in the discussion of this question the gentleman from California took pains to cast reflections upon that bureau of the Post-Office Department which has had this service in charge. I respectfully submit that those reflections are wholly unmerited and uncalled for. Economy, utility, and progress have been the watchword of those who have had in hand this organization. The system has been developed rapidly, yet conservatively. The courteous and painstaking gentleman who is charged with the general superintendence of the system has labored untiringly in its interest. No more faithful, efficient, and devoted public official can be found anywhere. It is all very well for the gentleman from California to refer to him contemptuously as "The big Indian" of the Post-Office Department. This country owes him a debt of gratitude for his administration of his trust, his thorough organization of the system, his skillful adaptation of it to the needs of those whom it serves. [Applause.]

Let me call attention to the fact that the gentleman from California has been instrumental in organizing this bureau, instrumental in organizing this service. He has six men in the service to-day—more than the most of us [laughter]—six of the best positions in the service, and yet he is the one, and the only one, who is complaining of the extravagant organization of the system, the expense of the service, the beaurocracy of the service, the ambition of the "Big Indian" to build up a great department. We who come in contact with this rural service, who come in contact with its various divisions, know that it is one of the best organized services of the Government. Go to the Post-Office building here in Washington, investigate the system as thoroughly as you please, and deny, if you can, the perfection of this organization, the economy of this organization. If there is any complaint to be made it should be made against such men as the gentleman from California, who have insisted that they must have six men in the service at big pay. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Department has gone on and has put the system under the civil service. The gentleman from California told us in opening this debate that it was a question to be determined to-day whether the system should be taken out of politics. The gentleman is not up with the procession. The Administration anticipated him by more than three months, and has taken the system out of politics just as far as it can be. I agree with the gentleman on the other side who spoke last [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who said that possibly as the system goes on and is developed it will be possible to surround it with still greater safeguards. But to-day it is taken out of politics as far as it is possible to take any system out of politics at the start.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. And as far as it ought to be.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Perhaps so, Mr. Chairman.

A gentleman on the other side stated yesterday—I have forgotten his name—that in his district since the 1st of February, when the civil-service order went into effect, there had been several appointments made in utter disregard of that order. I want to tell the gentleman, respectfully but most emphatically, that he is mistaken. These carriers may have been put to work since the 1st of February, but I repeat that since the 1st of February there has not been a single appointment made in this service except in accordance with the rules and regulations of the civil service.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the gentleman from Vermont consider that the provisions now thrown about the rural free delivery with reference to carriers are as strong as the civil-service laws generally applying to employees of the Government?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, let me say to that——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Are sufficiently strong to secure the same general result in the selection of employees?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I believe so. I say right here and now that I am a firm believer in the civil service. I believe these rules are the best that could be devised, considering that it is a new and unique system, in the early stages of its development. I do not see what more could be done in the direction suggested by the gentleman at this time. It presents an entirely new field for the application of the civil service, and the best methods and the best results must not be expected at the start.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I want to ask the gentleman from Vermont whether he has any objection to supporting a measure that would remove all doubt by providing that the civil-service law should apply to this service?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Not at all. This service is for the benefit of the people; not for the carriers; not for the politicians. It is for the farmers—the rural communities—and I want to see everything so done—I want to see this system so completely hedged about that it will work to the best advantage of the patrons—of the communities for which it was established.

In this connection let me say that another gentleman took pains to say yesterday—the gentleman from Kentucky, I think—that special agents and hired inspectors, who could scarcely read or write, might be sent out by the Department to conduct the examination of applicants for the position of carrier. Such examinations have been held since the 1st of February, when the President's order went into effect. Without discussing what might have been done or what might be done, let me call the attention of the House to what has been done since that time in this regard. Who are the men who have been selected by the Department to go out and examine the applicants for these positions since that date? First, there is Mr. E. W. Crawford, of the Fourth district of Kentucky, formerly a civil-service examiner. He is a college graduate. Then there is Mr. A. B. Veazey, of Vermont. He is a college graduate, the son of a distinguished judge and Interstate Commerce Commissioner, an average Vermonter, and that is all that needs to be said for him. [Laughter.]

Then comes Capt. C. W. Parker, of Ohio. Of course, Ohio had to come in. [Laughter.] He is a Spanish-war veteran, formerly a merchant, and a very capable man. Next comes Mr. Alexander Charles, of Iowa. Really, Iowa should have come first. [Laughter.] He is an editor, and for years was postmaster at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, under Mr. Cleveland's Administration. This last fact would probably condemn him in the eyes of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. [Laughter.] There are also Mr. W. J. Monroe, of Minnesota, president of the Minnesota State Editors' Association before he went into this service; Mr. J. P. Connolly, of New Jersey, for twelve years a postal clerk between Washington and New York, a very responsible position; Mr. J. B. Hussey, of North Carolina, formerly a Washington newspaper correspondent; Mr. H. C. Coles, of Virginia, formerly secretary to Representative SWANSON; Mr. Frank C. Hammond, of Indiana, also a thoroughly capable man; and, finally, the only man of whom I know very little, Mr. John W. Haas, of California. These are the men—this is the class of men which the Department has been selecting since the 1st of February to carry out the provisions of the civil service.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this proposition above all because the contract system is in itself inherently bad and is resorted to by the Government only when no other adequate method can be devised. The destinction between the Government employee and the Government contractor is clearly defined. The former is the servant and agent of the Government, subject to supervision at every hour of his service, liable to discipline, and held to the strictest accountability. The interests of the Government are his interests. The Government contractor, on the other hand, like the contractor in every field of activity, stands in a position diametrically opposed to this. He is independent of the Government; the work is given to him, not on account of his fitness, but because his bid was the lowest. He owes the Government nothing; the interests of the Government are not his interests; it is for him to do as little as possible under his contract in return for his allowance from the Government. The rural carrier under the present system comes into close contact and close confidential relations with the community. He is a traveling postmaster. He is intrusted with all of the mail, with registering letters, with the purchasing of post-office orders, with the sale and cancellation of stamps, and the rural public is entitled to have its interests guarded as the similar interests of the population of our cities and larger towns are safeguarded by the Government.

If the contract system were a good one, there is no reason why it should not be adopted in the cities where free delivery exists. No one questions for a moment that the adoption of this system would result in a large saving to the Government, but no one would question for a moment the effect upon the people of the adoption of the proposition to constitute the contract system for the one now in vogue.

Suppose that the gentleman from California had included in his bill a proposition affecting in this way the free delivery in his own city. How long do you think it would have taken the storm of protests from every class in that great city to reach his ears? The salary system is retained in the cities because it insures the best service; let us continue it in the rural communities for the same simple but potent reason.

The gentleman from California says it is impossible to equalize the pay of these carriers on a salary basis; that under the present method these carriers must all be paid $600, whatever may be the length of their routes. This is simply absurd, and shows how little he knows of the administration of the system. Before the law went into effect on the 1st of March, giving a slight increase of compensation to them, there were carriers in my district receiving $125 per year, others who were receiving $350 per year, and still others who were receiving $500 per year, according to the length of their routes. The pay of all these carriers has been slightly increased by the action of this House, and I take pleasure in extending the thanks of those carriers to those members who assisted so earnestly and effectively in securing for them this modest increase.

There is no more difficulty in adjusting the pay of these carriers on a salary basis than that of the letter carriers in our large cities. The carrier on a 20-mile route works as long as does the carrier in the city. It is none too much to pay him for eight hours' work after he has cared for his horses and his vehicles, driven over his route, and made his daily report.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one thing more. I disagree with the gentleman from California when he says it is "now or never;" when he says we must change the system now or not at all. I disagree with him when he says it is a question of $20,000,000 or $60,0000,000. I say that first of all this is a question of establishment, of progress, and if in a year from now the members of this House, having watched the progress of this system under the care and guidance of our new Postmaster-General, think it best to make a change, it can be done as readily as to-day.

I say the gentleman from California is hardly candid when he says in one breath that it is a question of $20,000,000 or of $60,000,000 and in the next moment, when asked by a member of this House whether he believes the contract system would reduce the expense to the Government, says he does not know. He says there "are routes in this service which ought to receive $900 and there are those which ought to receive less than $500," and when asked to give his judgment to this House upon the broad question whether this system would reduce the expense of the Government he says, "I do not know." I think his statement is honest. I think that respecting many other features of this measure which he proposes, and many other features of this service which he is attacking—attacking in the garb of friendship—he simply "does not know."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I say in conclusion what I said at the outset—I stand here to represent the patrons of this service. Scattered all over the civilized world is a great peace army. It gathers the news; it flashes it across continents and under oceans; it crystallizes it in the daily papers. For years it has been the pride of this great Republic that so complete is our postal system that every citizen of our larger communities has been able each morning at breakfast to read of what transpired the day before throughout the civilized world. It was the idea of the fathers of this system, it is the idea of the friends of this system to-day, that it will give a similar advantage to the residents of our rural communities, and I stand here to appeal in behalf of these communities.

I could read you scores of letters received by me during the past weeks by the patrons of this service in my district, recounting its advantages, telling how it broadens the horizon of the farmer, enables him to have his daily paper, secures him his daily market report, bringing him into closer contact with the outside world, enhances the value of his farm by bringing the post-office to his door, and diminishes the isolation of country life.

Let me remind you of the millions upon millions of dollars spent by the Government for public buildings in our large cities, and let me tell you that every dollar spent to develop our rural communities, to make them more attractive for our young men and women, is equally well invested.

This system has established its right to live—its capacity for development. It has become one of our great institutions, worthy of our Republic, worthy of our twentieth century life; and I appeal to you to let the present method—the method which has been tried through the years of the system's infancy—remain in force for at least another year. If, at the end of that time, those who have had it in charge, those who are most interested in its success—the patrons of these routes—give it as their judgment that the present method is not as good as the contract system would be, I shall be more than glad to yield my present convictions and to assist in the adoption of that system.

I sincerely thank you, Mr. Chairman and members, for your very considerate attention to these somewhat desultory remarks from one of those who, on the floor of this House, is supposed to "be seen and not heard." [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is a member of this body who seriously objects, indeed, who dares object, to the extension of what is known as the rural free-delivery system. I do not believe there is a member of this House who would do such a gross injustice to the rural portions of our country as to directly destroy this great privilege, when we see the great results that are following in the wake of this system, so much enjoyed; so much desired; so much needed, and so thoroughly indorsed as this by the farmers, who are mostly benefited. And I may add the cities are greatly benefited—because the merchant can communicate quickly and safely with the farmer with whom he wants to transact business.

There is no doubt about quick and safe communication under this system. In this way the farmer, even if he remains at home, is greatly benefited; so are the city and country merchants. I know the rural system is a great blessing to the farmer. I know what the denial of post-office privileges is to the farmer. I know what it is to have no post-office, to have one with a triweekly mail, and one with a daily mail, and I know the great convenience, indeed the great joy and permanent blessings, that this system has and will continue to confer upon the people who live in the country if this service is continued as it is; and I shall not be one who will change from a successful system to another system—the star-route system—that we know has in thousands of instances proved an abomination, so far as the mail service is concerned. It may be the rural system can be improved upon. It may be it can be conducted on a cheaper basis.

There may be many improvements made, as in all other projects, as time rolls on, but I see no hope of an improvement to turn this rural system as it is now into a star-route system, when we are so familiar with the inadequate and bad service of the star-route system and the adequate and good service of the rural system.

The farmer has never received that recognition that has been so generously bestowed upon every other circle of society, yet the farmer is the corner stone of good society. He does not groan under the heavy burdens that he has always to meet as a citizen and taxpayer of this country, and this is, so far as I know, the first direct accommodation that has yet been brought to his door.

It is the only tangible convenience of which I know that the Government has bestowed upon him as a citizen. He is entitled to this and more besides. This service is safe, sure; it is satisfactory to him, and I do not believe that the one which this bill provides for is. There is no doubt about this rural service being what is claimed for it. We know there is no doubt about the star-route service being inefficient, rotten in many places, and unsatisfactory, and I shall not support a measure which undertakes to turn an unimpeachable system into one that has been impeached from the time it begun.

There is, Mr. Chairman, an objection raised to the continuation of the present rural system on the ground that it may create a great army of officeholders and the system be turned into a great political machine; that this great "army" may invade Congress—may come here into the very halls, as it were, and compel Congress to pass legislation in the interest of this army of rural carriers and officers, well knowing that such legislation would be contrary to the general welfare of the country. That the farmer boys of this country who are employed in this service may become thus reckless and lawless I do not believe, and I repudiate any such intimation or imputation. For one, sir, I am not only glad to shake their hands when they appear here, which is very rarely the case, but I am glad to receive letters from them or indeed any of my constituents.

They have the inalienable right to petition or remonstrate with the lawmaking power of this country. If they choose to do this by letter or petition in an orderly and genteel way, we have no right to deny them the privilege of exercising this right or to treat such correspondence with contempt or even with silence, and I shall never, as long as I am a member of this body, be the party to strangle the liberal exercise of this right, which, thank God, every citizen in this Republic has enjoyed until the President a few days ago said that the employees of this Government, who have as many rights as he has as a citizen, should not be allowed to write hereafter to their members touching upon their official welfare or upon the welfare, possibly, of some other member of their family.

We are under oath here to represent the people, and we misrepresent them, if through ignorance we do wrong, when that ignorance may be easily dispelled if we are allowed to confer freely with our constituents and they with us. This rule and any other such rule and regulation or law announced or enforced by anybody under the American flag is an outrage against American institutions and American citizenship. I have stated this repeatedly, and I shall continue to do so as long as I am in this body and when I shall return to the walks of private life.

Mr. Chairman, I have given considerable attention to the question as to whether or not the contract system, which is sought by this bill to be substituted for the free-delivery system, will prove to be a less objectionable political machine than the rural free-delivery system under the civil-service rules under which the rural free-delivery system has operated since February 1, 1902.

Both systems are creatures of Congress. Both systems are operated by the political departments of this Government, and my judgment is—and certainly my observation is—that it is practically impossible to keep politics out of matters which emanate from the political departments of this Government. It is said even that the Supreme Court of the United States deliver political opinions sometimes. We have heard State supreme courts thus criticised. It being true, then, that both the rural and contract systems emanate from the political departments of the Government, the question that I have considered, and most seriously, with the lights now before me, is whether or not the rural service under civil-service system properly enforced will be more completely divorced from political influences and be less of a political machine than if it is succeeded by the contract system under the proposed bill.

I have decided, and shall vote accordingly, that while it will be impossible to divorce either system from politics, the chances for using the rural system for political purposes under a thoroughly well-enforced civil-service system, which we hope may be done, will be more efficacious in preventing the service from being used as a political engine than if the contract system obtains. My distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] and my eloquent friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] touched upon this vital subject yesterday seriously, and the latter spoke at great length. I regret that I shall not have time, nor do I feel physically able to-day, to reply fully to either, but I do think that both of the gentlemen have been misled, in that they have not had before them the recent rules and regulations which were promulgated February 1, 1902, and under which the rural system is now being executed.

They quoted from the old regulations. I hold in my hand a copy of the present civil-service rules under which the rural system now operates, and has since February 1, 1902. I will, by permission of the House, insert both sets of rules, which the Department, I believe, contend are practically the same, as much so as they can be to be applied to two different officers; first, a route inspector, and, second, a special agent, under the circumstances that surround the two officers. The first set of rules, I believe, apply to the route inspector after the service has been established and a vacancy occurs. You will find that there are 16 rules or conditions that must be complied with by the applicant and executed by the route inspector. Rule No. 12 provides:

After an examination has been held the route inspector will carefully observe the general characteristics of the candidates or applicants, taking special notice of health and physical conditions, and in submitting his report, state which, in his judgment, should be selected. Under no circumstances must political or religious affiliations of applicants be considered, nor must political indorsements be received or entertained. The merit of the applicant and the good of the service alone must be considered in submitting a recommendation.

Then at the end of the rules the following declaration appears, which, of course, is itself a rule of practice:

The central board of examiners will carefully review all recommendations for the selection of carriers in connection with the application and the written and card-reading tests submitted therewith. Special agents must therefore bear in mind that their recommendations will not necessarily control; they are, however, desired by the central board as a guide or aid in its consideration of the examination papers.

We find that the set of rules which applies to special agents, which was promulgated February 1, 1902, apply, I believe, both before or when preparation is being made to establish a route and after it has been established. It will be noticed that rule 12, which applies to "route inspectors" and the applicant which he examines, is also one of the rules which applies to "special agents," and at the end of this set of rules—that is, the rules which apply to special agents—we find the following:

The central board of examiners will carefully review all recommendations for the selection of carriers in connection with the applications and written and card-reading tests submitted therewith. Route inspectors must therefore bear in mind that their recommendations will not necessarily control. They are, however, desired by the central board of examiners as a guide or aid in its consideration of the examination papers.

So that, let the route inspector, or, under the other regulations, let the special agent make any recommendations he pleases, he is required to write down everything that is done. The examination must be in writing; the answers must be in writing; the report must be in writing; the statement is sworn to by the applicant, and the result of this written examination must be submitted under the civil-service rules that have obtained since February 1 to the central board.

Who compose the central board? Two Democrats, two Republicans, and an expert statistician, a lady who is expert in civil-service laws and rules and the manipulation of the civil-service system. So that we have practically a neutral board, composed of two Democrats, two Republicans, and a lady—a magnificent mugwump, the lady, and of course she is going to do right; I am willing to trust her. Now, this is the best we can do under the circumstances. This is a Republican Congress. This is a Republican administration, and it is certainly better to have that board to which the farmer's boy can appeal finally, and if this board does not do right, then the farmer's boy can appeal to the civil-service board, presided over by General Procter, an old Confederate soldier.

So, first, he appeals to the inspector and he examines him and then reports to the central board, composed of two Democrats, two Republicans, and this lady, who is allowed to vote and is a member of the board, and then if that board does not do right you can appeal to the Civil Service Commission. Here the farmer boy has three trials, three chances. Now, gentlemen, which will you have, the chance for three trials, three hearings, or will you, Mr. Chairman, leave it entirely in the hands of the Postmaster-General, as this bill does, to do as he pleases, without any appeal at all?

I have not the time nor the voice to read all of the provisions of this bill, but there is one to which I wish to make reference. It is in reference to bids to carry the mail and is found on page 3, and is as follows:

But the Postmaster-General may reject all proposals submitted under any advertisement.

The Postmaster-General may and will, if he desires, reject "all" proposals under "any" advertisement.

There is autocratic power, there is a one-man government, there the thing ends, and it does not make any difference whether the man is acceptable or whether he is not, because the very words of this law say that "all proposals," regardless of whether they are of merit or demerit, can be set aside and a call for new propositions ordered by the Postmaster-General.

Now, which will you take as the final judge, the Postmaster-General, whom we know is a Republican, and an expert campaigner, I understand—and if he does not act he will appoint some subordinate who is worse probably than he is—which will you take, I say, the Postmaster-General, with all his one-man power and no chance to be heard, or the civil service, with three chances to be heard? I have looked the situation over, I have studied it, and I say, between the two things, first, that I am for the perpetuation of the present system; second, I am opposed to the contract system of this bill because it is full of politics and leaves it entirely to the dictum of the Postmaster-General to appoint whom he pleases, whereas in the present system it is left to a route agent who is under oath and under bond, and then the papers go to the central board of five, and then from there appeal lies to the Civil Service Commission.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these conditions are exactly what force and impel me to vote against this bill, and I am going to do it. In brief, Mr. Chairman, I think more and better opportunities are given, in other words, to the farmer boy to secure his rights and to get a position in the rural system as it is than in the bill as it now stands, and I am not afraid to trust him in peace or war, where he has always been a hero, a patriot, and an honor to our Republic.

Mr. MOON. How does that happen that he has this better chance to get this position?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Here are the rules and regulations right here. Here they are under these rules.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. You refer to the fact that an appeal can be had to the central board and then from the central board to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; that is my information officially given.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. What good will an appeal do from the finding of the central board to the Civil Service Commission, when that appeal is to be heard upon the record made out by a partisan local route agent? He makes up the record.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will you tell me how much better you are off when that same record is sent to the Postmaster-General whom you know is a Republican, and who as you know wants to keep the Republican party in power?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes; I will answer you.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Because it gets to the last analysis more quickly that way, and we claim that when the Postmaster-General does that, that we can appeal to the people and charge it up to his party. That is what we do, but when you get through this process of appealing from board to board you mix the matter up in that way, and you can not charge it directly to the party in power.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We will charge it directly, because the man who does wrong under the civil-service system will have his commission under the Republican Administration, and we can still charge to the Republican Administration any maladministration in the civil service. And if he does wrong we will have a larger record—all in writing—to show his wrongful act.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. But we are greatly delayed in getting to that point.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, but you are delayed before a country boy is turned out, too, if he gets in. He has three trials to get this position and has a trial or trials before this board before he can be turned out, whereas under the law proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] he has only one chance and before a Republican or Democrat, as the case may be, who can be a partisan and do as he pleases, and you can not help yourself, because he acts in his so-called discretion. Now, Mr. Chairman, what has been the record of the star-route service? Has not that been a rotten service, and is not this an inadequate service? Have not my friends from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] and from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] voted for the rural free-delivery system ever since they have been in Congress, and we all know that they were down on the star-route service and substituted the rural service for it to reach the farmers. Now they are trying to substitute the star-route service and its machinery for the very recent and splendid rural service.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I do not want the gentleman to say that I am down on the star-route service at all; but it does not reach to the individual. That is the reason.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What does not reach to the individual?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The star-route service.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, the rural service does.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The rural service reaches the individual.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I say I do not want you to represent me as being down on the star-route service, for I am not. I am for the star-route service, but I am for the rural service likewise, because it extends to the individual.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; and yet you want to harness it up in the star-route regalia, and the star-route service heretofore has been a failure—at least inadequate and in places rotten.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I say it has been a great success.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, in addition to that being an inefficient service, I was shocked to find, the other day, from the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, ending June 30, 1900, that the average number of failures per month in the star-route service was 220, while in one month last year it ran as high as 700, and the total for the year was 2,640 failures.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. For how many routes?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Out of all the routes; 2,640 failures for the year 1900, and 700 in one month.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. How many routes are there?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not know.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman ought to show what the percentage was.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There had been no failures in the free rural-delivery system for the year ending June 30, 1900.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. There had been but very few routes established up to that time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Although not included in the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, an unofficial estimate places the total number of defaulting contractors for 1901 at 2,900. Inquiry at the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General elicits this information, and more—that not 10 per cent of the bonds of these defaulting contractors can be realized on, and that the mjority are entirely worthless.

Now, I want to say to my friend that two nights ago I asked a Federal judge of Tennessee what amount the Government realized in money from the bonds that are forfeited in the postal service, and he said, "Nil," to use his prompt reply and language. His answer was "Nothing." So at best we have a bad service in the star-route service, and then we have defaulting and no recovery on the bonds; bad service and loss of money, because they can not realize on the bonds, two confessed evils that strike at vital parts of the mail service.

Now, here it is proposed to suspend this free rural service and substitute a star-route service that is bad in places and inadequate all along the line, and always has been and always will be, and to go back to the old system of subletting, that is so unsatisfactory to the country. The question is, Shall we do that, or shall we go on with this system that has gratified and pleased the farmers of this country more than anything that we have ever done for them?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there is no subletting under this system.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD, here, these instructions to these rural agents, and other regulations relating to the subject, and a letter from Mr. Machen, just received. I have not had the time and I have not the voice to read them, but I am very anxious that they appear in the RECORD.

INSTRUCTIONS TO ROUTE INSPECTORS RELATING TO THE EXAMINATION OF APPLICANTS FOR THE POSITION OF RURAL LETTER CARRIER.

On February 1, 1902, the order of the President classifying rural letter carriers will become effective. After that day vacancies occurring in the force of carriers will be filled in accordance with rules of the Civil Service Commission.

The following special rules are prepared for the guidance of route inspectors, who will be detailed to conduct examinations where vacancies exist:

1. A letter carrier who resigns will not be permitted to discontinue service until his successor is appointed and qualifies.

2. In the case of the death or removal of carriers, postmasters will be instructed to employ the substitute carrier, and if there is none, any suitable person until the regular examination can be held.

3. When the route inspector is advised of a vacancy by the Department, he will proceed to the post-office as quickly as possible, notifying the postmaster by wire, if necessary, of the day he will reach there, and instructing him to notify applicants to be on hand to take the prescribed examination.

4. Each applicant will be given a blank application, which he will fill out with pen and ink in the presence of the route inspector.

5. Each applicant, separate and apart from the other applicants, will be required to read 25 addressed envelopes or cards. The route inspector will carefully note every error made by the applicant, and the time he takes in the test.

6. Each applicant will be required to fill out a blank registry receipt and a blank receipt for money for the purchase of a money order.

7. Applications of badly crippled or deformed persons will not be considered. This will include persons who are totally deaf or blind, who have one arm or one leg, etc.

8. Applications of persons under 17 or over 55 years of age will not be considered, except in the case of honorably discharged soldiers or sailors of the civil war or Spanish war who are physically able to perform service.

9. Applications of persons will not be considered who have not the necessary equipment for the service, namely, horse and wagon or cart, unless applicant can satisfy the route inspector that he will be able to supply such equipment in case he receives the appointment.

10. The applications of women will be received, but a woman should not be recommended for appointment as regular carrier unless, in the judgment of the route inspector, local conditions and circumstances are such as to make the recommendation desirable and for the best interests of the service.

11. Applicants must reside directly on or within the territory to be supplied by the route where the vacancy exists.

12. After an examination has been held, the route inspector will carefully observe the general characteristics of the candidates or applicants, taking special notice of health and physical conditions, and in submitting his report state which, in his judgment, should be selected. Under no circumstances must political or religious affiliations of applicants be considered, nor must political indorsements be received or entertained. The merit of the applicant and the good of the service alone must be considered in submitting a recommendation.

13. In recommending a selection from among the applicants who were able to fill out the necessary blanks, route inspectors will give preference to thsoe who, by long and constant residence in the community, are well acquainted with the patrons of the route, hold their confidence, possess the necessary equipment, and are prepared in cases of emergency to furnish a suitable substitute.

NOTE.—Section 1754, Revised Statutes: Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall be preferred for appointment to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices.

14. In filling a vacancy the substitute carrier competing in the examination with other applicants, everything else being equal, should be given preference.

15. When a route inspector has doubts about an applicant's character or reputation he should not only make inquiry of two or three persons given as references in the application, but also consult two or more prominent citizens not mentioned by the applicant.

16. A rural letter carrier will be required to furnish a suitable substitute, who will be required to give bond in the same amount as the carrier, namely, $500. With the separation of the regular carrier from the service the substitute also will be dropped, but will be permitted to take the examination in competition with other applicants for the position if he can meet the requirements of rules 7, 8, 9, and 11.

The central board of examiners will carefully review all recommendations for the selection of carriers in connection with the applications and written and card-reading tests submitted therewith. Route inspectors must therefore bear in mind that their recommendations will not necessarily control; they are, however, desired by the central board of examiners as a guide or aid in its consideration of the examination papers.

——— ———, General Superintendent.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SPECIAL AGENTS RELATING TO THE EXAMINATION OF APPLICANTS FOR THE POSITION OF RURAL LETTER CARRIER.

On February 1, 1902, the order of the President classifying rural letter carriers will become effective. After that date the selection of carriers will be made under the following rules:

1. In all petitions for service filed after February 1, 1902, the petitioners will be required to nominate not less than three persons whom they deem trustworthy and who are willing to accept the position.

2. The special agent who makes the investigation for the establishment of the service will also conduct the examination of the applicants for the position of carrier.

3. The special agent will advise the postmaster in due time of the date he will reach the office from which the proposed route or routes will start, and instruct him to notify the applicants named in the petition, and any others who may apply, to be on hand to take the prescribed examination.

4. Each applicant will be given a blank application which he will fill out with pen and ink in the presence of the special agent.

5. Each applicant, separate and apart from the other applicants, will be required to read twenty-five (25) addressed envelopes or cards. The special agent will carefully note every error made by the applicant, and the time he takes in the test.

6. Each applicant will be required to fill out a blank registry receipt and a blank receipt for money for the purchase of a money order.

7. Applications of badly crippled or deformed persons will not be considered. This class includes persons who are totally deaf or blind, who have one arm or leg, etc.

8. Applications of persons under 17 or over 55 years of age will not be considered, except in the case of honorably discharged soldiers or sailors of the civil war or Spanish war who are physically able to perform service.

9. Applications of persons will not be considered who have not the necessary equipment for the service, namely, horse and wagon or cart, unless the applicant can satisfy the special agent that he will be able to supply such equipment in case he receives the appointment.

10. The applications of women will be received, but a woman should not be recommended for appointment as regular carrier unless, in the judgment of the special agent, local conditions and circumstances are such as to make the recommendation desirable and for the best interests of the service.

11. Applicants must reside directly on or within the territory to be supplied by the proposed route.

12. After an examination has been held the special agent will carefully observe the general characteristics of the candidates or applicants, taking special notice of health and physical conditions, and in submitting his report state which, in his judgment, should be selected. Under no circumstances must political or religious affiliations of applicants be considered, nor must political indorsements be received or entertained. The merit of the applicant and the good of the service alone must be considered in submitting a recommendation.

13. In recommending a selection from among the applicants who were able to fill out the necessary blanks, special agents will give preference to those who, by long and constant residence in the community, are well acquainted with the patrons of the proposed route, hold their confidence, possess the necessary equipment, and are prepared in cases of emergency to furnish a suitable substitute.

NOTE.—Section 1754, Revised Statutes: Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices.

14. Everything else being equal, one of the persons nominated by the petitioners for the service should be selected.

15. When a special agent has doubt about an applicant's character or reputation, he should not only make inquiry of two or three of the persons given as references in the application, but also consult two or more prominent citizens not mentioned by the applicant.

16. A rural letter carrier will be required to furnish a suitable substitute who will be required to give bond in the same amount as the carrier, namely, $500. With the separation of the regular carrier from the service the substitute also will be dropped, but will be permitted to take the examination in competition with other applicants for the position if he can meet the requirements of rules 7, 8, 9, and 11.

The central board of examiners will carefully review all recommendations for the selection of carriers in connection with the applications and the written and card-reading tests submitted therewith. Special agents must therefore bear in mind that their recommendations will not necessarily control; they are, however, desired by the central board as a guide or aid in its consideration of the examination papers.

General Superintendent.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
OFFICE OF GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT FREE-DELIVERY SYSTEM,
Washington, March 5, 1902.

SIR: Replying to your personal inquiry of this date, I have to say that the instructions printed on page 2521 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are for route inspectors who are specially detailed to conduct examinations for the filling of vacancies which occur in the established service. These instructions differ from those given to special agents—not, however, in material points.

Special agents alone establish service. Under the rules we require that the petitioners for new service shall nominate applicants for the position of carrier. The rules do not, however, limit the examination to those suggested by the petitioners. Any others may apply; but with everything else equal, one of the nominees of the patrons or petitioners is to be selected. All selections, whether to fill vacancies or for original service, are made through the central board of examiners. This board carefully reviews the recommendations of the special agent, or route inspector, in connection with the examination papers which are submitted.

Very respectfully, yours,

A. W. MACHEN,
General Superintendent.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

PETITION FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF RURAL FREE DELIVERY.

The FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned heads of families, residing in ——— County, State of ———, respectfully ask that the rural free-delivery service be extended to them, the delivery to start from ——— post-office, ——— County, ——— State, or such other point as the officers of the Department may deem best adapted for the service. A map or rough sketch of the proposed route is outlined on diagram herein. The roads over the proposed route are ——— ———.

There are no unbridged creeks and the roads are passable at all seasons of the year.

We agree to the official regulations governing the service, and to erect, for the reception of our mail, boxes which have been approved by the Department.

Name of head of family.	Occupation.	Number in family over 16 years of age.	Miles to nearest post-office.

APPLICANTS FOR POSITION OF CARRIER.

Name, ——— ———. Proposed by ——— ———.

Outline the proposed route on the following diagram, locating the office or point from which it is to start, in such a manner that the entire route will appear thereon.

Then follows a diagram showing how to lay out by metes and bounds the route, north, east, south, and west.

I hereby indorse the within petition and urge that the same be granted.

——— ———.

[To be signed by the Representative or United States Senator.]

This petition, when properly signed, should be sent to the Representative in Congress or to one of the United States Senators, with a request that he indorse thereon his recommendation of the service asked and forward the petition to the Department.

Mr. SWANSON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HENRY C. SMITH].

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to a part of this bill which I have not heard discussed, and which I think is important.

In the first place, as is generally known to those who have given the subject consideration, this service has not been classified. It has been carried on the appropriation bill and has been considered as experimental only, and I submit that the object and purpose of this act is to remove the service from that experimental stage and to put it in such a position that henceforth it will be under the general laws applicable to the other divisions of the Post-Office Department, and I believe that if the country understood the provisions of this act there would be such a sentiment raised against it that there would not be a vote in its favor.

In the first place, the farmer who is supplied by rural delivery gets one great benefit through that service by reason of the facility with which he receives his county paper, and under the rulings of the Department, since this is in its experimental stage, the country paper is permitted to circulate in the county of its home free and is permitted to be carried by the rural carrier free. But if you enact into law the provision in this bill which provides for this service, henceforth you say by classifying there will be an end of the free county newspaper, and it will stand on equality with every other paper and must be delivered by a special carrier or pay the other rate of postage. This bill is in the direct interest of the great city daily and detrimental to the home papers, and for this reason, among others, I oppose the measure. Another thing: This is only classifying a part of the employees. What are they? If we are to have a general bill, classifying the rural-delivery service, why not have one creating a separate department for it, defining its powers and the scope and breadth of its powers and responsibilities, create what seems to be the desire on the part of some, a fifth assistant postmaster-general, to have charge of and map out and control the service. But in this bill it is only proposed to classify the special agents, classify the route inspectors, classify the clerks, and classify or change the method of hiring the carriers.

NOW, I submit that the thing that the people complain of, and the only thing, in the rural service, so far as I have been able to learn, is not the cost of the service, not the method by which the carrier carries his mail, not the kind of a rig that he uses, or the carrier himself. The thing they complain about is being compelled to use some particular kind of a box, of a particular kind of a make of box, fourteen of them, approved by the arbitrary power of some man; and you must have one of the fourteen kinds or this Department says that your mail shall not be brought to you. You may erect in front of your house in the city a cigar box; you may have a silver box, or a hat box, or you may have no box at all, and when the carrier in the city comes to your door he brings your mail and puts it in the box you provide; and yet you say to this farmer, to whom you have promised so much, "You must buy one of fourteen boxes approved by a committee," selected by what my friend from California calls the great "big Injun," selected by some committee. Why do you not provide in your bill for the kind of the box that shall be used, instead of providing some method by which the carrier shall be selected?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Yes, sir. Is there a box factory in your district?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. On this question of boxes, let me ask you about what is said to be going on down there. Is the gentleman prepared to say whether he has any information that certain employees of the Post-Office Department are interested in the manufacture and sale of any of these boxes?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. I never heard anything of the kind and I do not believe they are. I believe they are honest men. They are honest; they are intelligent Republicans. I understand one was a Democrat, but he has gotten over that and he is all right in every other particular in my judgment. Now, that is the proposition. If this bill is to create a service that the people desire, what complaints there are is with reference to the boxes in which the mail is deposited, and there are no other complaints. There is no demand for this legislation.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is the gentleman for the box or against it?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. I am against having the people compelled to take any particular kind of a box. I want them to have the right to take the kind of box they want.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is that involved in this bill?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. It is not a question that is directly involved in this bill, perhaps. I am complaining because it is not covered and regulated by this law. If the gentleman is a member of this committee, and I think he is, why do you not consider some of the bills before your committee? Why do you not involve it in this bill here, when you classify the service?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. We want to get through with one thing at a time.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Why not take the thing that the people are complaining about and want legislation about the first thing, instead of taking up a thing that no one has asked for? During all the years since we have had the free-delivery service you have had an opportunity to let the carrying of the mail out to the lowest bidder, but there never has been a bill brought in until to-day, because when you think you have the farmer to deal with he will be content with something cheap; you want to cheapen this service by letting out the carrying of the farmers' mail to the lowest bidder, and not till now has this ever come to the mind of man to do such a thing with the mail of the banker, the merchant, and the manufacturer. Why not treat all alike? There is no more reason why the rural service should be let out to the lowest bidder—and he will be low enough in every walk of life, in my judgment—than there is why the post-offices should be let out to the lowest bidder.

What would gentlemen on this floor think if Congress should enact a law letting out the office of their private secretary to the lowest responsible bidder? What would they think of a law letting out the fourth-class post-offices to the lowest bidder? Why, gentlemen, in a city not 200 miles from here, quite an important one, I know to-day where the contract for carrying the mail from the railroad to the post-office has been let to a man—let to the lowest bidder, a man who could pass for J. Whitcomb Riley's raggedy man. This man is poor; he has got a rig of one mule and one horse and an old fish wagon that he goes about the city with, and the people are not satisfied to have their mail carted about in such an unsightly rig; and that is just exactly what this thing will come to in the rural districts if this bill becomes a law. The farmer will be delivered his mail by dagoes, by any man that is willing to work for 30 cents a day and live on rice. I tell you that the farmer in my district is a high-toned man, and he is entitled to high-toned service.

They have been waiting all these years for something good; they have been promised all these years something good. They are the most intelligent men up in my country, too. I have letter after letter and protest after protest and telegram after telegram, asking me to file my protest against this bill, which proposes to let out the carrying of the farmers' letters to the lowest bidder, the contract to the men that bring the mail, the sacred letter to their doors. Shall this great Government compel the farmer to receive his mail from a man that he would not employ to do the meanest service, a man that he would not willingly permit upon his premises? I sincerely trust not.

Mr. LOUD. Why does not the gentleman read some of them and let us see whether they are from carriers or not?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Well, here is one from the president of the Michigan Association of Postmasters. The postmaster comes right in contact with these carriers, too, and in a sense is responsible for their conduct and is qualified to speak upon the subject. Not one of my protests comes from a carrier.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is he a farmer?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Yes; the same kind of a farmer that you are. He does not farm the land, but, like you, he farms the farmer. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed.

Mr. LOUD. The time to be charged to the other side.

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan be allowed to proceed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Now, Mr. Chairman, here is the point about it: How is this man to be selected? This bill says that "the service shall be awarded to the lowest bidder who shall furnish evidence satisfactory to the Postmaster-General that such bidder is a legal and actual resident," etc. How is that evidence to be brought to the Postmaster-General? How will he find out whether this is a moral man, a clean man, a man fit to associate with his family, with the family of the pure and honest farmer, and fit to bring letters to his family? How will the Postmaster-General here in Washington investigate the moral character of a man in California or Oregon, or in any distant part of the Union? Will the Department appoint an agent to go around, at large expense, and take an account of stock and inquire into the moral standing of the men? The way to select a carrier is the way they have been selected, in my judgment, the way that has turned out and proved to be absolutely satisfactory.

Mr. OTEY. Will the gentleman from Michigan allow me a question?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Yes; if the gentleman is within reach of the Constitution. I can not hear very much that he says.

Mr. OTEY. How are you going to tell by his moral character how he stands with the civil service?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. The postmaster of the post-office recommends the man, sends in his name, investigates and speaks for his worth and character, and he is in a position to know. He is the near neighbor of the man. If he is not, he can inquire of his neighbors and friends, and that is how it is to be done. The special agent who establishes the route also investigates the character of the carrier, and the method now used is safe and satisfactory.

Now, what other thing is there in here? It provides that he shall perform acceptable service. I would like to appeal to any attorney as to what that word means? "Acceptable service." Acceptable to whom?

Suppose he gave a bond to perform "acceptable service." If it is acceptable to the Postmaster-General, then the Postmaster-General is not in a position to know whether it is acceptable or not to those who are being served. If it is to be acceptable to the patrons of the route, there would be an eternal and everlasting conflict and contention as to what was satisfactory and what was not. Suppose suit were brought upon a bond given by a carrier selected under this law, setting up the claim that he had not performed "acceptable service," what would be the evidence which would warrant a recovery? What would be the penalty and the judgment? To my mind it is so general, uncertain, and impracticable as to be absurd.

Mr. OTEY. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. OTEY. Who is going to certify to the character of the postmaster?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. The Republican members of Congress as long as you and I live [laughter on the Republican side], in my humble judgment.

Now, my friends on this committee, I ask you if the fear is such that this rural delivery is going to grow so large and become so extensive that it will swamp and bankrupt the Government, as we have been warned, and that there should be some curtailment somewhere, and, as these gentlemen say the rural-delivery carrier should not have a carriage or a wagon or a harness or a horse provided for him, I ask them why it is that they have not followed the recommendation of the committee appointed by this Congress to reduce the pay of the railroad companies to carry the mail? Why not start there? The Government of the United States substantially furnishes cars to them. As I had the honor to say on this floor a year ago, they pay a rent equal almost to the value of the car. [Applause.]

The title of this act is "To classify the rural free-delivery service and fix the compensation to employees thereof." Now, neither in the bill, nor in the report of the majority of the committee, nor in any speech so far made has there been any indication as to what the purpose of this law is, or what has led to its being brought before Congress, except, and only, as to the manner in which the carriers are selected. We are not told why it is to be classified nor what is meant by its being classified. If by this is meant the making of a general plan for the conduct of the department of rural free delivery, then the bill is too uncertain. And it would seem as though the scope of the bureau or service or the conditions under which the service should be established and some plan of the service would be the first thing to be thought of and provided for.

Indeed, as I have before stated, the box is the only thing which has led to any criticism, and yet in this bill no provision whatever is made for the box, the kind of box to be used, or any regulations concerning the service, or protection to the box. The proposed bill only enacts that—

The Postmaster-General be, and is hereby, authorized to classify the rural free-delivery service and fix the compensation to employees in such service as follows.

Then it proceeds to fix the compensation of certain employees, but makes no statement or provision as to classification of the service, but, on the contrary, to the classification of certain employees, officers, and agents of the Department.

There are bills before this same committee, one introduced by myself, providing in substance that the Government shall furnish the boxes, and there are other bills, but no attention is paid in this act to the box, or indeed to anything except employees.

It has been said on this floor that the object of the act is to make the service permanent, instead of experimental, as now. If this were the real object of the act, then the title would be "An act to create a permanent bureau of rural free-delivery service," or something of this kind. I believe that the only purpose is to bring this service within the general law regulating the Post-Office Department, so that the Postmaster-General shall be prevented from using his judgment and discretion, which he has used ever since the service has obtained to the entire satisfaction of the public and to that extent that this service has become and is the most popular measure fostered by the Government.

It has revolutionized life on the farm and has made it the most desirable where it has always been the most beneficent, and best adapted to the best development of boys and girls—the best thing in the world. With electric cars, automobiles, good roads, and rural free delivery, all of the other of the genteel and refined people of the nation will find pleasant and agreeable life—a life of purity and pleasure—on the farm. It is perfectly wonderful how the roads have improved since rural delivery came, and how content and happiness has come to the life of the farmer. And with these things the rush of the boys and the girls from the farm to the overcrowded cities will be checked, and the tendency will be in the other direction. From the beginning of history to now the honest farmer has been the pride and glory of the world, and he is to-day the best hope of this Republic. [Applause.]

And I want to make as strong as it is possible for me to do my protest against letting this service out to the lowest bidder. Against auctioning it off as you would old and unsalable property. Against hawking the Government's jobs from the old auction block. Against taking all the pleasure out of the service by stamping it with cheapness.

The real fact is that there is no demand for any such legislation; and the honorable chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], confessed the whole thing in his opening words in presenting this bill to the House when he said it was "as natural for him to oppose as it was for him to breathe." Oppose what? What was in the mind of the gentleman that he was opposing? Who was he opposing, as he believed? It was only the goading of his conscience that compelled him to make this honest utterance. And in the depths of his heart he felt that he was opposing the interests and the desires of those who were being served. He at least must have feared this. He knew that the measure was not popular, for he knew that the Post-Office Department had not suggested it. No political party, which is the organ of public sentiment, had asked it. The newspapers have never spoken for it, not a newspaper of any description has ever suggested a change in the method of the selecting of the carriers or asked for or suggested the classification of this service. Not a newspaper nor a living soul nor any man from the Post-Office Department nor any report from the Department has ever suggested the classifying of the service or the changing of it from an experimental to a permanent service. Not a petition nor a letter is shown suggesting it.

The gentleman from California in charge of the bill says that the Department opposes the measure, and intimates that some officer in the Department dictated the minority report upon the bill.

He further takes credit to himself as being the father of rural delivery, and then proceeds to excuse his appearance at the bedside of this experimental child by the assertion that he was led into the confession of the paternity of the child and to assuming the guardianship thereof upon the statement that the poor weakling would be able to subsist on $300 a year; that the farmer's boy, the chores being done, would carry the mail with an old horse and a milk wagon for that sum and even less, but that he has now been shown a new light and sees that, to his disappointment, his progeny has become so popular that it is liable to assert its strength and manhood to that extent that Congressmen will be carried beyond their judgment and the Treasury will be in peril.

And he insists that some of the younger members are just tasting for the first time the sweets of patronage and do not want to see this taken away. I am at a loss to see his logic, since the service is already covered into the civil service and the patronage is already gone, and gone forever. He sees the fallacy of his own logic, and his conscience goaded him again to make excuse, and he tells the House that it has been whispered, without mentioning to whom, that the order of the President of the United States was simply buncombe, and that Congressmen will still have the patronage. I have a higher estimate of the courage and patriotism and honor of the Chief Executive of the Republic than this, and I am surprised that a member of this House should make such intemperate criticism of the President of the United States. This office ought to be respected. The free choice of a free people should have the respect of the people. I submit that we can not expect to have our Chief Executive and the office respected by the people if the people's representatives in this forum shall accuse him of such a purpose to violate the law.

I have a higher estimate of the people's Representatives than to believe, with the gentleman from California, that they will be carried beyond reason by the carriers of the mails in the rural districts. Indeed, a man does not have to be here long to learn that patronage is weakness instead of strength. The average member of Congress would be glad indeed if he had no patronage, which to my judgment is the best excuse, if there can be any excuse for it, for the civil service. A man who is fit to help his district in this body, and fit to legislate for this great nation, ought not to be embarrassed with patronage. And for one I wish there were a law against a Congressman interfering in behalf of any Government employee and against appearing or acting in behalf of any measure the object of which is purely a private enterprise. There is no place in our country for ring rule and the triumph of the political boss.

Ex-Senator Ingalls once said, and truthfully, that when a Representative appointed a man to an office he created one indifferent friend and nineteen active enemies.

Another excuse which the gentleman from California makes for the measure is that it will tend to equalize the pay of the carrier. And it is attempted to be shown that there is a difference between a rural carrier and a city carrier in this respect. But I submit the difference, if there be any, is not great, Take, for instance, a large city. One carrier may have just one large office building in which he simply rides in the elevator and goes about delivering the mails on the various floors. Another may have a block in the business part. Another may have a route in the outskirts where the population is sparse and where he must walk a long distance. It is impossible to have equality. In ancient times it was sought to make all men of the same height, to create an equality of likeness in appearance at least. But this can not be accomplished. The best man will win in every race of life. Service can not be equal in any of the departments of Government.

What other department of the Government is in any measure self-sustaining? There is no profit in the Department of State, in the Treasury Department, or War and Navy, or the Interior, or the Department of Agriculture. This Government is not run for profit. It is not a business enterprise; it is a service. In England and in Germany and countries where the population is congested and the post-office department carries parcels and does express business, it may be self-sustaining; but in a country like ours, where the average piece of mail travels many miles, it is not expected by the people that the business can be conducted with profit. Nor do the people demand this. All they want is quick, accurate, effective, and economic service. This is a great country, rich in wealth and rich in revenues, and I never yet heard a complaint because the Post-Office Department is not self-sustaining.

I desire to call attention to another fact. Clause 4 of the act provides—

That rural free-delivery carriers heretofore appointed and now in service may be continued as carriers, at a rate of compensation not exceeding $600 per annum, until such time as the Postmaster-General shall advertise for proposals to make awards for the several routes on which such carriers are now employed.

And I would like to be informed how the 7,000 carriers now in active service and under the civil service can be thus legislated out of office. And in their behalf I make appeal that this is unfair to them, if it can be done, who have thrown up their ordinary avocations, have purchased wagons and horses and harness, have changed their plans of life.

The American people cherish fair dealing, just and fair treatment, far more than to be relieved of a few of the small burdens of taxation. If this bill shall pass we will find ourselves confronted with another permanent census bill in which a few of the favorite officers and officials shall be "classified" into permanent places, and the poor clerks and carriers will be "classified" out of place. And we will be confronted with the same gnashing of teeth, and the same despond and discouragement we see in these poor underpaid clerks and carriers who justly complain that they are overlooked, while those with large salaries are secure for all the future. And this in the name of economy! Economy ought to commence with large salaries and not with the poor clerks and carriers.

The rural service is a neighborhood affair, and the neighborhood should control—control as to who should carry the mail, and in a sense control the pay. I believe that the postal clerks on the railroad are underpaid. They do more work and better work and more hazardous work for the pay received than any other of the Government servants. And it take years of experience to reach a class where the compensation brings a living, and after those years of experience the clerk is unfitted for other employment and worn-out. Why not auction off these jobs to the lowest bidder?

Returning again to the carriers in the cities, who walk upon sidewalks, in continual contact with the people, in comparison with the rural carrier his service is a merry round of pleasure. The Government furnishes him a sack in which to carry the mail, and all he furnishes is the clothes he wears, his energy, and ability. When will the gentleman from California classify this service? When will he auction these jobs off to the lowest bidder? The rural carrier, who under this bill can not receive over $600 a year, must furnish a team, a wagon, and harness, and he must go three hundred days in the year—no holidays, no sick leave—rain or shine, sick or well. And he must feed and care for his team, keep his rig in repair, his horses shod, and renew his outfit as it becomes worn-out. And still the gentleman from California says that this child of rural delivery would have been a foundling and an outcast, so far as he is concerned, had his suspicions been aroused in the beginning that a carrier was ever to receive more than $300 a year for all this.

The character of the postal service of the people is a good index to the character of the people, we are told. The more enlightened and intelligent and enterprising the people, the more efficient will be their postal service. I agree with this, and, as I have before said, the farmer is the most intelligent and enterprising of any of our people. He likes the carriers selected under the present methods of the Department. He is his neighbor and is aided and assisted by the patrons. Would the patrons be interested in a man who simply furnished a bond and was to do simply and only what is nominated in the bond? Service compelled by obedience to a bond would not be acceptable service.

In conclusion, I desire to say that this boon, long kept from the farmer, now highly appreciated, against which no complaint is lodged, ought not to be crippled or hindered or made unpopular by the changing of any system which has worked satisfactorily. When dissatisfaction comes, it will then be time to make a change.

And for these reasons and the reasons before mentioned and for many others which could be enumerated if time permitted, I shall be proud to register my vote against this measure. [Applause.]

Mr. LOUD. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I feel a little uneasy about the fate of this bill. I noticed that when the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HENRY C. SMITH], than whom there is no speaker more interesting in this House, rose to talk, there were just 11 Republicans in their seats. That indicates that members have made up their minds that they do not want any further argument in favor of their position. Let me add, however, that a good many members came in as soon as they learned who was speaking.

I have no charges or reflections to make. I think we all want to do that which is best for the whole country, and especially for our respective Congressional districts. But if there is any member on the floor of this House who has heard of a single Representative having as many as thirty routes in his district on which he has been permitted to select the carriers, who is in favor of this bill, I want to know who he is? That implies no reflection upon any member. The constituents of a member have a right to instruct him. I do not think there is any constitutional question involved here.

We want to do that which is best, best for the whole country, and I will admit freely that so far as I am able to judge of this matter—not being practical in respect to these things—I do not know whether the service will be best rendered by adhering to the present system or by adopting the contract system. Of course under either system the best men may be appointed and the best service secured. It may be possible that upon the average, under this bill, there would not be furnished quite as good carriers as we are getting under the present system. To that extent perhaps the change might injure the service a little, but when the question is between injuring the service and injuring the institutions of our country, of the whole country, I do not hesitate to take the responsibility of deciding the question.

Unless gentlemen are very much mistaken in their views, this service must increase. It ought to increase. Now, with 40,000, 50,000, 75,000, or 100,000 rural carriers, why would they not be potent in nominating and electing members of this House? Why should they not have a right to be potent? You talk about putting them under the civil service. You may do that; you may put padlocks on their mouths if you please, but you can not close the mouths of their relatives and friends living in the neighborhood and prevent them from advocating measures which are for the benefit of these carriers.

I want to ask the rural gentlemen on this floor—and just before a nomination or an election to Congress we are all rural gentlemen—to show me a member of this House who will say boldly and openly to-day that he will not vote in the future to give the rural carrier as much for his services as is allowed to the city carrier. The maximum salary for the city carrier, with limited hours of service, is now $1,000 a year; and ever since I have been in this House, gentlemen have frequently risen here and talked about the horrible conditions imposed upon the city carriers throughout this country. We constantly hear appeals for the relief of these carriers in the way of increased salaries. Twelve hundred dollars a year is asked for the city carrier.

Would you dare to refuse to give the rural carrier, who has to plod through mud and snow and slush, furnishing his own team, as much as you give the city carrier, whose route is over paved streets and under the protection of awnings? Where is the rural gentleman who would vote for such a discrimination? Therefore we may expect that the salaries of the rural carriers will gradually be increased from $600 to $1,200—it may be $1,500. I do not know that the rural carriers will nominate or have an influence in nominating members of this House in the future, but their constituencies have a right to expect and demand just what other constituencies demand.

There is one feature of this bill which I hope to see amended; for without it I do not see how I can vote for the bill. The bill now provides, as I understand, that upon routes already established carriers already appointed or who may be in service when this contract system goes into effect may continue in the service at the discretion of the Postmaster-General. Now, I want to limit that discretion. Should this bill pass, I do not want any carrier appointed under the existing system to continue in the service more than four years from the time he was appointed or the route established. I do not say that the Postmaster-General should not be permitted to re-let a route before the four years have expired; but I would require him to do so at the end of four years. If we are going to have the contract system, let us have it as a whole; let us make its application universal.

Now, my friends, this is not a political question. We can certainly discuss it in a friendly spirit. Let us determine, if we can, which system will give the greatest good to the greatest number; let us see which system will come nearest to serving the wants of those for whom the system is established. Now, who need this rural free-delivery system? Certainly those people who live farthest from the post-offices, who have to go farthest for their mail, who suffer the greatest inconvenience by reason of not getting their mail promptly.

Under the rules at present established there must be a hundred families upon a route before the service can be extended to them. I presume one reason for this requirement is because the Government can not afford the expense of paying $500 or $600 a year to serve a smaller number than 100 families. Under the contract system, in districts where there are good roads and cheap facilities for carrying the mail, the contract price might be reduced below $600, while in sparsely settled districts with poor roads it might be advisable to give more than $600 in order to secure efficient service. And less than 100 families might be required in order to secure the establishment of a route. In my district those people who most need this service live where they will never get it under the present system, because you can not find 100 families within the limit of the route.

Take my own county, for example. I had a pride in having the service established there first. All last year I was at home, and I tried to get gentlemen to circulate petitions and establish routes. At that time the pay was $500 for 25 miles; and do you think that I could get a single man to circulate a single petition? Why he would say, "Take our roads, over hills and hollows and creeks, we can not get 100 families within the 25 miles, and if we could we can not perform the service." It takes a wagon, in this country, and two horses, and the character of man that can be appointed carrier is such that he is worth something regardless of holding the job. The result was that I could not get a single petition filed in my own county.

After I arrived here this winter I heard that the salary was going to be raised to $600. I then wrote to several of them, and have succeeded in getting four or five petitions filed. That is a broken, hilly country, and whenever the route there is let on contract the people who live on it know what it is worth to carry it and what they can afford to undertake it for, and they may get as high as $800 or $1,000 for doing it, and I know they will get enough to carry it and will carry it if they undertake it. Now, as a contrast to this, take some of the counties in the district of my distinguished friend Mr. GAINES and of my distinguished friend Mr. PADGETT, both from Tennessee. Some of the counties in their districts are the best in the United States.

They have turnpikes all over them. Twenty-five miles out on those turnpikes—why, it is a breakfast spell to run over them. A route over those turnpikes is intrinsically and honestly not worth more than half as much to carry it as it is over the roads in a district like mine. Therefore some under the present system get more than it is worth and others get less, and many communities which are justly entitled to this service can not get it at all. With the contract system I hope that the service may be extended—more routes, less cost, less money, and greater extension of the service.

I do not blame gentlemen for being affected by the wishes of their constituents where it is not a question of principle or the Constitution involved, and you know a Democrat never goes against the Constitution. I admit that constituents have a right to instruct their Representatives, and ought to have in this free country. Therefore I do not see how we are to get gentlemen elected to this House who will not be influenced by so large and so influential a body of men as the carriers will constitute. Why, I have read and reread I do not know how many letters from the railway postal clerks asking us to vote for a reclassification of their service and an increase of their salaries. I do not think any the less of them for making that request. They have rights and they have friends on the floor of this House, and they ought to have, and are worthy of them.

I am in favor of the rural carrier being paid as much as the city carrier, and will vote for such a law; but while I say this I am in favor of economy in all lines of public expenditure, and while we are in favor of doing all we can for the "dear farmers," we must not forget that they, in the end, pay the taxes, and they are not likely to favor high salaries for either rural or city carriers. While the farmers want rural free delivery, they do not want to pay more for it than it is really worth. With 50,000 carriers getting $1,000 each per annum, farmers and other taxpayers will have to pay $50,000,000 per annum to these carriers. Such a sum staggers the imagination. Just pause and think what a stupendous campaign fund these 50,000 carriers can raise by a 5 per cent assessment or voluntary contribution. Such a power in politics is dangerous when it can be used for mercenary purposes. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to putting the city carriers under contract if it is practical to do so.

Let us be calm and try and do what is best for the country as a whole, having due regard to the future as well as the present.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire whatever to make any extended remarks on this bill. It has been my habit and custom since I have been a member of Congress to rather listen to others talk than to talk myself; but as a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and having in connection with the other members of that committee, and especially the members of the subcommittee, given considerable attention to the proposition contained in this bill, I feel like offering some suggestions on it.

In the first place, I may say that, having at all times been an ardent advocate and supporter of rural free delivery even before we ever had it in its experimental stage, I certainly would not give my consent at this time to anything which in my judgment might cripple or discredit the service. Long before we ever secured an appropriation which was used for the purpose of attempting this as an experimental service I advocated the establishment of such a service in this country.

I advocated it for various reasons, amongst them being the fact that the man in the country, isolated from city and town life, out by himself, having, in many instances, to travel miles to get his weekly and triweekly papers and his letters, would receive a great boon if he could have his mail delivered at his door, as we do in the cities and towns, and have what he desired to send out collected from the same place. I felt that it would bring him more in direct touch with his Government, which he was expected to maintain and support. I felt that it would relieve the monotony of his life, that it would give him greater opportunities for coming in contact with the world in general and keeping himself better posted with reference to what was going on in his country.

I felt that by the adoption of rural-delivery service, extending it as rapidly as it might be extended, the man in the country would feel that this Government was his Government, that it was looking after his interests as well as after the interests of those who lived in the cities and the larger towns.

Another reason was that in this country, new as it is, our roads are not in as good condition as they should be. I believed then, and that belief has been confirmed by observation since this service was established, that if we should establish and gradually increase the rural service our roads would be rapidly improved. Such has been the case. The improvements along these lines are growing, and it is now a part of the condition imposed by the Department, when the establishment of a route is asked for, that they must improve their roads as rapidly as they can, so as to facilitate the work of the carrier. Those were two of the reasons. There are many more, but, as I said, I intend to speak but a few moments, and I will not wait to give other reasons.

Those reasons, to my mind, were sufficient to induce me to advocate the establishment of the service, and have been the incentive for my earnestness and for my constant vote to increase the appropriations and to extend the service as rapidly as it can be extended.

Several of the gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to this bill seem to look no further than to conclude that there is some sinister and secret political scheme behind the measure. Replying to that, I will say that in my judgment that is unworthy the consideration of the intelligent gentlemen who have expressed such views on this floor. There is no politics in the matter, and when the bill was under consideration in the committee—and I am violating no secrets of the committee in stating this—every member who was opposed to myself politically, excepting two, voted for it. The committee considered the measure, they looked at it from a business standpoint, they considered whether, if it were adopted, it would improve the service or keep the service in as good a condition as it is under the present system, not whether, if adopted, any political advantages might be attained by the Republican party.

After giving it that business consideration which gentlemen who occupy positions on this floor are always supposed to give to every question, they voted in favor of the bill and recommended that the same be reported favorably to the House. So there is no politics in it. There is no desire on the part of any man on that committee who voted for the measure to discredit the service, to cripple the service, or to injure any person who is now in the service. As this is a new and a growing service, one that will become one of the largest branches of the postal service, the only question was, Had we better not begin at the beginning and consider what is the most advantageous and best method of providing for and selecting the carriers so as to continue the service in as good condition as it is, to improve it if possible, and to make it as economical as we could without injury to it?

Those were the considerations which actuated your committee in the weeks and weeks of hearings and in its deliberations on this bill.

We are asked, instead of taking up this rural-carrier service and providing for letting it on contract, why not go to the other branches of the service and do the same thing? In reply to that I would say this is the only proposition of this character now before us. Let us consider it as sensible men and as business representatives, and after disposing of it, let us, as time rolls on and these other matters come up for consideration and adjustment, take them up and dispose of them on their merits.

Some gentlemen on the floor have insisted that we let this run for a number of years without making any change whatever and then begin to make a change. I say the best time to regulate these matters is as near as possible at the beginning of the service. In the beginning this service was experimental, but it is now a permanent service, and I hope that I may live long enough to see the mail delivered at the door of every householder in the United States by the rural carrier, and all my efforts in the future, as they have been in the past, shall continue to be to improve the service and extend it as rapidly as possible.

This service has been compared by some to the old system of star routes as formerly conducted. I will not go into the details of that; but every gentleman who has read the bill and given the subject any consideration whatever knows that in this bill we have divorced it entirely and absolutely from the old star-route system. We have thrown around the service, if let by contract, every safeguard that was considered necessary to prevent any of the improper practices which were charged under the old star-route system.

Now, without going into details, or taking up the various clauses in the bill, I will say this, that I favor the measure with an amendment which I will mention later. I would favor the measure without the amendment which I shall offer, but in my judgment, and in the judgment of many members of the committee, with the amendment which I will before concluding send to the Clerk's desk to be read for the information of those who may care to examine it, I believe that many of the objections which have been urged on the floor will be overcome. We want this service to go on. We have given in our appropriation bill every dollar since the service was first started which has been asked for by the Department.

We have increased the appropriations year after year, beginning with the first service at $40,000, in the next year $50,000, the next year $150,000, the next year $450,000, the next year $1,700,000, last year $3,500,000, and we have in this bill, as asked for by the Department, every dollar which was deemed necessary by them for the maintenance and furtherance of the service during the next fiscal year. The amount is $7,529,400. Making such appropriations as we have made, can any gentleman feel or believe for an instant that those who favor this measure are opposed to rural free delivery? I have had no complaint about this bill, excepting some of the carriers have written or wired me that they hoped I would vote against the bill. I take it for granted that they have not read the provisions of the bill or may have misunderstood the purport of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I will ask the chairman for some more time, being a member of the committee.

Mr. LOUD. I will yield the gentleman ten minutes more, if that is sufficient.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. That will be ample.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for ten minutes more.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Of course, Mr. Chairman, many of those carriers have been in the service from the time of its inception. They are anxious to continue in the service. That is commendable. I am strongly in favor of their so remaining. But we, representing the whole people, must look beyond the individual and look to the interests of the service and the people as a whole.

Now, Mr. Chairman, without taking up more time, because while I would like to discuss the bill in detail, yet the chairman of the committee [Mr. LOUD] at the opening of the debate, and on yesterday the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], discussed this subject in a full and comprehensive manner, taking up every point that is connected with this bill—its objects, its aims, its purposes, and the objections in detail which had been urged against it on the floor. A repetition of those propositions by myself would not furnish any additional information to those who have not given it their personal attention; but as some members of this House are fearful that if this bill should become law the carriers now in the service would be legislated out of a job, although we, as your committee, feel that the language is sufficient to prevent that being done, yet to relieve any doubts or suspicions on that subject I shall, at the conclusion of paragraph 4, while the bill is being considered under the five-minute rule, having the permission of every member of the committee with whom I have spoken on the subject, who make up more than a majority, and having seen all that I could see up to the present time, offer the amendment which I now send up to the Clerk's desk, and ask that it may be read in my time for the information of those who desire to consider it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting in line 18, page 3, after the word "employed," the following:

"Provided, That the Postmaster-General shall not advertise for such proposals or make such awards for any route in operation at the date of the passage of this act until July 1, 1906, or until a vacancy shall occur by reason of the death, resignation, or removal of the carrier who may be serving on any such route at the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, with that amendment added to the bill, it substantially removes all of the objections which have been offered by any of those who have spoken against it. If any members are afraid that those in the service will lose their jobs, this amendment, if adopted, provides that until July 1, 1906, which will be four years from the 1st of next July, all carriers in the service at the date of the passage of this bill shall be continued as they are now serving and prevent the possibility of the Postmaster-General letting their routes under a contract during that time unless a vacancy should occur.

In the second place, while it has been urged frequently, and has been made one of the strong points against this bill, that the contract service will not furnish as efficient and ample and proper service as we have had under the former existing conditions under which carriers are now serving, this amendment will give us four years from the 1st of July next to let the two services run side by side, all of these 8,000 people now serving as carriers going on until a vacancy occurs by death, resignation, or removal, and then we will have ample time to compare the present system with the proposed system under this bill. And within the four years there is no doubt in my mind whatever but what this whole matter will adjust itself, and of the two systems, after trying them side by side, we can adopt as a permanent system that one which is the better. As I stated, at the proper time, under the five-minute rule, I shall ask that that amendment be considered at the end of clause 4. [Applause.]

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11728, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE RUFUS K. POLK, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, late this morning I learned with sincere regret of the death of my comrade and colleague, the Hon. RUFUS K. POLK, of Pennsylvania. In accordance with the usual practice of the House, I will offer and ask the Clerk to read the following resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers the following resolutions, which will be submitted to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. RUFUS KING POLK, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That in his death the State has lost an able, devoted, and patriotic servant.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Speaker be authorized to appoint a committee to superintend and attend the funeral of deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to his memory the House do now adjourn.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

And then, in pursuance of the resolutions (at 2 o'clock and 45 minutes), the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communication was taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, relating to an appropriation for rental at Los Angeles, Cal.—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11895) granting a pension to Thomas Holloway, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 755); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DEEMER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7683) granting an increase of pension to Almond Delamater, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 756); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills; which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4451) granting an increase of pension to George K. Thompson—Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 7651) to provide for additional compensation for deputy collectors and inspectors of customs for the district of Huron, Mich., etc.—Committee on Ways and Means discharged, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS, MEMORIALS, AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 6, 1902.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. BURROWS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

DEATH OF PRESIDENT M'KINLEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting a letter addressed by the Chamber of Deputies of Portugal to the Congress of the United States, expressing its condolence upon the death of President McKinley. If there be no objection, the communication will be read to the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Translation.]

No. 34.

CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES, PRESIDENT'S OFFICE.

MOST ILLUSTRIOUS AND EXCELLENT SIR: In the fulfillment of my very painful duty, I moved, on assuming the presidency of this chamber, that there be entered in the minutes of the session of the 8th instant a resolution of profound sorrow for the lamentable assassination of the President of the United States of North America, McKinley.

The president of the council of ministers, on behalf of the Government; Deputy João Marcellino Arroyo, on behalf of the majority, and Deputy Francisco Antonio de Veiga Beirão, on behalf of the progressist minority, joined in this manifestation of condolence, uttering feeling expressions of sad homage and extolling the qualities of the illustrious deceased.

Subsequently the chamber, by a unanimous vote, resolved to approve by motion and to make the proper communications touching this resolution, which I now have the high honor to communicate to Your Excellency for the information of the Congress over which you so worthily preside.

God guard Your Excellency.

Palace of the Cortes, the 15th of January, 1902.

MATHEUS TEIXEIRA DE AZUECES.

THE MOST ILLUSTRIOUS AND EXCELLENT PRESIDENT OF THE LEGISLATIVE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES OF NORTH AMERICA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication and accompanying papers will lie on the table.

APPORTIONMENT OF DEPARTMENTAL EMPLOYEES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the president of the Civil Service Commission, transmitting, in further response to a resolution of the 19th ultimo, certain information relative to the apportionment of appointments in the departments at Washington under the civil-service act; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM S. DERBY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (S. 2815) granting an increase of pension to William S. Derby, returned from the House of Representatives in compliance with the request of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I present a petition signed by Mrs. Lillie Devereux Blake, president, and other officers of the National Legislative League, requesting the enactment of "such legislation as shall relieve native-born American women from the loss of citizenship in this Republic when married to a subject or a citizen of another nation." The petitioners set forth that they "ask this because such loss of citizenship entails on women much injury by the forfeiture of property, which can not in many States be held by aliens, and deprives them, even in widowhood, of the protection which the United States should always extend to her daughters as well as to her sons." I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT of New York presented a memorial of the Lake Seamen's Union, International Seamen's Union, of Tonawanda, N. NAUTICAL ALMANAC.

Mr. MARTIN. I received recently an inquiry from one of the scientific schools of my State for a copy of the Nautical Almanac. In attempting to get it I received a letter from the superintendent of documents which discloses the fact that there is a delay of about three years in printing the Nautical Almanac, with the exception of a very small edition which is available to only a few people. I should like to have the letter which I received read and referred to the Committee on Printing.

The letter was read, as follows:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT OF DOCUMENTS,
Union Building, Washington, D. C., March 4, 1902.

Hon. THOMAS S. MARTIN,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of 3d instant, the Nautical Almanac is supplied to designated depository libraries. The trouble is, however, that depositories are supplied from the document edition, each issue of which is printed for the current calendar year, while the departmental edition, printed for the official use of the Navy Department and for sale, is printed three calendar years in advance. These advance editions are the ones desired by libraries or institutions having observatories, and they can not be obtained except by purchase.

The money expended by the Government in printing and binding the document edition had just as well be thrown away, as that edition is received by the libraries too late to be of any use to them.

Very respectfully,

L. C. FERRELL, Superintendent.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the letter be printed as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks that the letter be printed as a document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It will be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11471) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, to report it with amendments, and to submit a report thereon. I give notice that I shall call up the bill to-morrow morning directly after the routine business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referted the bill (H. R. 3762) for the relief of Emanuel Klauser, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1634) to remove the charge of desertion against the name of Thomas Cordingly, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2533) to remove the charge of desertion against Frederick Schulte or Schuldt, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3360) for the promotion of First Lieut. Joseph M. Simms, Revenue-Cutter Service, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4139) to diminish the number of appraisers at the ports of Philadelphia and Boston, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3375) relating to the construction of a dam across Rainy River, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 314) for the relief of persons who made the first payment for desert lands under the act of March 3, 1877, but who were unable to perfect entry thereof, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington (for Mr. SIMON), from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3182) granting an increase of pension to Mary Louise Worden, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also (for Mr. SIMON), from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3662) granting a pension to Sarah C. Nicklin, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 1697) granting an increase of pension to Richard A. Lawrence; and

A bill (H. R. 1688) granting an increase of pension to Charles Armstrong.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3400) to amend section 1098 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1553) to restore the status of the Chicago Dragoons, who served during the war of the rebellion, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were agreed to, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 584) to remove the charge of desertion standing against Jacob C. Breyfogle; and

A bill (S. 2857) to correct the military record of Jackson Brown.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 299) for the relief of William C. Dodge, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

CRIMINAL LAW.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report a resolution, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That there be printed 1,000 copies of House Document No. 362, of the Fifty-seventh Congress, being one of the reports of the International Prison Commission on the "Growth of the Criminal Law in the United States," by Hon. D. K. Watson, which copies shall be for distribution by the Department of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Are no copies to come to the Senate or House?

Mr. PLATT of New York. There is not any occasion for it. This is a matter of very little importance. The cost will be but $20, and it was not thought worth while to make a distribution to members of Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. HOAR on the 28th ultimo, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 7,500 additional copies of Senate Document No. 164, third session Fifty-fifth Congress, being the report of the Daughters of the American Revolution for 1890–1897, together with the historical preface herewith, indorsed by the board of management of that society, of which 2,500 shall be for the use of the Senate and 5,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4261) to provide for printing, and binding in cloth, additional copies of the first edition of Government documents and publications for distribution to the designated depository libraries in lieu of the sheep-bound copies of the document edition, so called, now supplied to said libraries, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read in full to the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever any annual report, serial, periodical, or miscellaneous publication of an executive department, bureau, board, commission, or office of the Government shall be ordered printed upon the requisition of the head thereof, or upon the order of Congress or either House thereof, the Public Printer shall print 600 copies in addition to the number named in the requisition or order of Congress, unless previously ordered, to be known as the "library edition," for distribution by the superintendent of documents to State and Territorial libraries and designated depositories: Provided, That this act shall not apply to confidential matter, blank forms, or circular letters.

SEC. 2. That Congressional numbers shall not be printed upon any of the documents or reports provided for distribution to State and Territorial libraries and designated depositories under the provisions of section 1 of this act.

SEC. 3. That in binding the library edition the best grades of cloth shall be used, and the Public Printer shall, as far as practicable, assign a distinctive color to the binding of the publications of each department and office, and when a color has been assigned the same shall not be changed; and to insure prompt delivery the Public Printer shall give precedence in binding to documents intended for distribution to libraries and depositories.

SEC. 4. That whenever any printing shall be done upon the order of Congress or either House thereof, or upon the requisition of the head of an executive department, bureau, board, commission, office, or Congressional committee, except matter marked confidential, blank forms, and circular letters, two copies shall be sent, as soon as printed, by the Public Printer, if printed at the Government Printing Office or any branch thereof, or by the head of the office upon whose order the same was printed if printed elsewhere, to the superintendent of documents for entry in the Monthly Catalogue; and whenever the injunction of secrecy has been removed from any document printed as confidential two copies of the same shall be sent by the proper official to the superintendent of documents.

SEC. 5. That beginning with the first session of the Fifty-eighth Congress the Public Printer shall deliver to the superintendent of documents for distribution to State and Territorial libraries and designated depositories, bound, of House documents and reports and of Senate documents and reports, except those included in the library edition, each 600 copies.

SEC. 6. That all laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLERICAL FORCE IN ASSESSOR'S OFFICE.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom the subject was referred, to report a joint resolution, and I ask for its immediate consideration. It is a small matter.

The joint resolution (S. R. 65) to provide for the employment of extra clerical force in the office of the assessor of the District of Columbia, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $1,000 is hereby appropriated for the compensation of extra clerical force in the office of the assessor of the District of Columbia, to assist in the additional work incident to carrying out the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 15, 1902, permitting the payment of arrears of taxes in the District of Columbia at the rate of 6 per cent per annum; one half of said sum to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the other half out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIANS ON COLVILLE RESERVATION.

Mr. PENROSE. The bill (S. 601) referring the claim or claims of certain bands or tribes of Indians on the Colville Reservation, State of Washington, to the Court of Claims, and for other purposes, introduced by my colleague [Mr. QUAY] on the 4th of December, 1901, has been referred to the Committee on Claims. At his request I ask for a change of reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Committee on Claims will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and it will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

AMENDMENTS TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURTON submitted an amendment proposing to amend section 1 of the act of Congress approved March 1, 1895, entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of additional judges of the United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 for new buildings and other improvements at the Indian school at Fort Lewis, Colo., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ELASTICITY OF CURRENCY.

Mr. DIETRICH. I submit a resolution pertaining to finance, and I ask immediate action upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Committee on Finance be, and it is hereby, instructed to prepare and present an amendment to the banking law which shall provide an element of elasticity to the currency of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BURROWS. I think it had better be referred to the Committee on Finance. I ask that it be referred to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DIETRICH. I accept the Senator's suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so referred.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3653) for the protection of the President of the United States, and other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in connection with this bill I desire to put in the RECORD an address delivered by Judge Colt, of the United States circuit court, before the New Hampshire Bar Association in the city of Concord on the 2d day of the present month. Judge Colt has discussed this question with his usual learning and great ability, and I feel sure that Senators in considering the bill will be glad of an opportunity to read this most admirable address. I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address referred to is as follows:

ADDRESS OF JUDGE LE BARON B. COLT, OF THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, BEFORE THE NEW HAMPSHIRE BAR ASSOCIATION, AT CONCORD, N. H., MARCH 2, 1902.

A solemn and imperative duty has fallen upon the country—the protection of the President of the United States. The subject is of the gravest public concern and of peculiar interest to our profession. It is a startling commentary on our vaunted intelligence, progress, and security that we are unable to guard the life of one individual in this country, and he the most honored and best beloved.

There is no conceivable crime so atrocious as the causeless murder of the chosen ruler of a free people. Such crimes rise infinitely higher than crimes against the individual. They are crimes against humanity, civilization, and the country's life; against society, law, and liberty. They are a blot upon free institutions, a stain upon the flag. They undermine the happiness and well-being of the people. They lower our standing and character in the opinion of mankind.

Has our fancied security indeed proved a dream and a delusion? Has our boasted liberty become the liberty of assassination? Is this the end of the struggles, the sacrifices, the aspirations of the people for self-government? Is this the consummation of the long, weary, and bloody march of mankind to this fair land of freedom?

The record is appalling. In thirty-seven years three Presidents have been assassinated—an average of one assassination every twelve years. The history of Europe for one thousand years furnishes no parallel. To find one we must go back to the military usurpers of ancient Rome.

During these comparatively few years the assassinations of our Chief Magistrates have equaled, if not exceeded, those of the rulers of England since the Norman conquest in 1066 and of France during the last ten centuries. No King of England has been assassinated for more than four hundred years, and but one ruler of France in nearly three centuries. During the life of the Federal Government, a period of one hundred and thirteen years, no ruler of England, Germany, or Spain has suffered death by violence. France, Italy, and Austria have each escaped with a single victim, while Russia records but two instances.

This comparison becomes the more amazing when we consider that tyrannicide, regicide, and religious fanaticism were among the principal causes which have led to the assassination of European rulers, and that these causes have not existed here. Nor is this striking contrast to be explained by reference to latter-day anarchism, for, at most, only one of the four attempts upon the lives of our Presidents can be traced to that cause.

We can no longer plead in justification our supreme faith in a free people and democratic institutions as a shield against such attacks, nor that it was impossible for us to imagine how any human being should wish to murder Lincoln or Garfield or McKinley, who sprang from the people, whose lives were consecrated to their happiness and well-being, and who died "holy victims sacrificed on the altar of liberty."

Nor can we insist upon the violence of party spirit inherent in a democracy as the cause, nor will it do to urge too strongly in defense the inadequacy of our laws, either punitive or preventive. We may, perhaps, as a people, be forgiven for the murder of Lincoln—the offspring of the violent passions born of civil war—and we may find a historical parallel in the murder of William of Orange or Henry IV of France; but the recorded annals of mankind will be searched in vain to find a parallel to the murders of Garfield and McKinley.

From 1789 to 1902 there have been 4 attempts to assassinate the Presidents of the United States, as compared with 10 attempts in England (exclusive of 4 minor assaults), 17 in France, 10 in Russia. This list is without doubt incomplete. Moreover, it does not include many plots and conspiracies which were discovered before consummation.

Limiting this comparison to the attempts since 1860, we find 3 attempts upon the lives of the Presidents, as compared with 2 in England, 5 in France, 8 in Russia, 3 in Germany, 4 in Spain, 3 in Italy, and 2 in Austria. The comparatively small number of attempts in England during these years may be in part due to the almost absolute seclusion of Queen Victoria after the death of Prince Albert.

This comparison gives the following result: Since 1860 all of the attempts upon the lives of the Presidents of the United States were successful; the two attempts upon English rulers were unsuccessful; of the five in France, only one was successful; of the three in Germany, none; of the eight in Russia, only one; of the three in Italy, only one; of the four in Spain, none; and of the two in Austria but one was successful.

Limiting this comparison to the attempts by anarchists, in which the country is now deeply concerned, we find in the past forty years only one such attempt upon the life of the President, as compared with three in France, six in Russia, one in Germany, two in Italy, and one in Austria. The single attempt in this country was successful; that in Austria was also successful; that in Germany was unsuccessful; of the three attempts in France but one was successful; of the six in Russia, only one, and of the two attempts in Italy but one was successful.

To summarize: Of the four attempts to assassinate the Presidents of the United States since the foundation of the Government, in 1789, three have been successful, or 75 per cent; of the 55 attempts to assassinate the rulers of Europe in the countries above mentioned, since 1789, only five have been successful, or about 9 per cent. Since 1860, of the three attempts to assassinate the Presidents of the United States three have been successful, or 100 per cent; of the 27 attempts to assassinate the rulers of Europe in the countries above mentioned only four have been successful, or 15 per cent. The single attempt by anarchists to assassinate the President of the United States has been successful; and of the 13 in the European countries only four, or 30 per cent.

In this comparison it should be remembered that the personal protection afforded European rulers undoubtedly prevented many attacks which otherwise would have occurred. The circumstance that a ruler is openly guarded has a marked deterrent effect upon assaults of this nature. Had the would-be assassins of England's rulers since Washington took his seat accomplished their object with the same ease as in this country, in all human probability the number of victims would have been more than double the number of our martyred Presidents, and in France the number would have been four times as great.

It follows that this country would have been comparatively free from these tragedies if reasonable precautions had been taken to protect the person of the President. Had the portico of the Capitol been properly watched as the President passed along, the would-be slayer of Jackson, who for some time had been walking about unnoticed, would have been apprehended; had the entrance to the box in Ford's Theater been protected against intruders, Lincoln would not have been shot; had there been some person on watch to observe the approach of Guiteau as the President and Mr. Blaine walked unattended through the waiting room of the railway station on that fatal July morning, Garfield would not have been stricken down, and had not the custom prevailed of the President, on all public occasions, freely shaking hands with large crowds of people, or had such handshaking been conducted under proper regulations and precautions, McKinley would be alive to-day.

These considerations strongly confirm the view that the number and frequency of our national tragedies is not owing to the prevalence of a spirit of assassination, but springs from our overconfidence and want of caution, and that the most effective remedy lies in keeping, as far as possible, suspicious persons at a safe distance from the President. The sentimental notion that, because we are a democracy and the people have been accustomed, freely and on all occasions, to meet their Chief Magistrate, and that to impair this time-honored custom would be unrepublican and savor of royalty, must not stand in the way where the life of the President is at stake.

The conditions which might have rendered it reasonably safe for the President to mingle openly with the people in the early days of the Republic are changed, and we must adapt ourselves to the new environment. "New occasions teach new duties; time makes ancient good uncouth."

The bill recently reported to the United States Senate from the Judiciary Committee by Senator HOAR is certainly a movement in the right direction. By section 7 of the bill "the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to select and detail from the Regular Army a sufficient number of officers and men to guard and protect the person of the President of the United States without any unnecessary display." If this provision should be supplemented by the appropriation of a sum of money to be at the disposal of the President for the purpose of securing additional police protection, it would be a further aid.

It is a somewhat significant fact in this connection, that no assault has ever been attempted upon the President in the White House, where reasonable precautions are taken. The situation does not demand that our Chief Magistrate shall travel from place to place with the military pomp of some European rulers, or with the gorgeous pageantry of Queen Elizabeth, but it does demand that he shall be accompanied by reasonable safeguards appropriate to the simplicity and dignity of republican institutions.

We are confronted with two associated causes which can not be eradicated. The social and industrial conditions of modern society, and the unbalanced mind, the extremes of wealth, power, ease, and lavish luxury on the one hand, and poverty, ignorance, misery, and the struggle for existence on the other, in a society which also contains the diseased brain, the dethroned reason, homicidal mania; the victim of the delusion of imaginary wrongs to himself, his class, or his nationality; the would-be suicide who thinks if he kills a ruler monuments will be erected to his memory; the degenerate, the fanatic, and the criminal. So long as these social conditions exist we shall not be free from attempts to assassinate our Chief Magistrate.

The danger of a disputed succession to the Presidency, such as existed in 1876, can not be ignored. This is a danger inherent in our electoral system, and is the weak spot in our federal form of government. Nor must we overlook the possible consequences of a conflict between labor and capital under present industrial methods. It is an economic law that periods of general financial depression occur about every twenty-five years; and if the situation during one of the crises should be aggravated by a shortage of crops, it might produce conditions which lead to political conspiracies. But no such situation seems near at hand, and we may rest reasonably secure against attacks upon the life of the President springing from any such cause.

The present danger is not so much from anarchistic conspiracies hatched by any of the known groups of anarchists, as from some morbid individual who feels that he must become the executioner of anarchy—the most dangerous criminal known to history. It is fifteen years since August Spies and others were executed. Had any of the groups of Chicago anarchists, in revenge for their death, planned to assassinate the President, many opportunities would not have been wanting. President Carnot, Empress Elizabeth, and King Humbert have all been assassinated by some member of a group of Italian anarchists. A branch of this group is located in Paterson, N. J., and Bresci went from there on his mission to kill the King of Italy. Had this group included among its intended victims the President of the United States, the accomplishment of that purpose would have been an easy task.

The type of anarchists who seek to enforce their doctrine by assassination discloses difficulties in the way of meeting the situation by laws. According to Regis, they are the typical regicides or magnicides who have existed from remote antiquity. Professor Lombroso, of the University of Turin, as the result of his researches, finds that a large number of this particular type of anarchists are madmen and criminals.

It is hard to reach this type of anarchists by legislation. He is not easily discovered in the country, nor easily kept out. It is said that the leader of an Italian group of revolutionary anarchists travels from country to country at will. Anarchy, or anarchism, is a broad term. Philosophical anarchism, which is beyond legislative control, is a theory of social life based upon an ethical view of human relations. It is the philosopher's dream of a perfect state of society composed of perfect human beings. It signifies that if everybody did what was right there would be no need of government.

If the writers on anarchism limited their language to the legitimate discussion of their theory of society, the State could not well complain; but such is not the fact. In Proudhon, Bakounine, Kropotkine, and other writers are found thoughts and expressions which incite to violence and which provoke the writings and pamphlets of the radical revolutionary anarchists. We may cite a few examples of their teachings and maxims.

"Governments are the scourge of God." "Property is robbery." "Theft is the recovery by violence from the rich of that which the rich have taken by violence from the poor." "Appropriation by force must be the anarchists' prelude to the wholesale insurrection which they will sooner or later enact." "Law has no title to the respect of men. Born of violence and superstition, and established in the interests of the consumer, priest, and rich exploiter, it must be utterly destroyed on the day when the people desire to break their chains." "No more laws! No more judges! Liberty, equality, and practical human sympathy are the only effectual barriers we can oppose to the antisocial instincts of certain among us."

Such ideas, taken up by the extreme revolutionary anachists, lead to the expression of such sentiments as the following:

"Our only hope is earnest, organized action. Burn, kill, and destroy until we force the autocrats to turn. We have lost hope in God, hope in humanity, and hope in the world at large. Let every man do his duty. This is a time when the workingman will either become a slave or a master. Choose between the two, and choose at once. Let us give no quarter, and ask none; only let us stand by each other, and each man at his post. If we must die, let us die like men and not slaves."

Revolutionary anarchists should be prohibited by severe penal laws from uttering, writing, or publishing language threatening, advising, or instigating the killing of the President, or advising or instigating another to kill the President, or conspiring with others to kill the President.

The comprehensive and carefully drawn bill of Senator HOAR, from which we have already cited one provision, covers this whole branch of the subject. It punishes with death any person who, within the jurisdiction of the United States, shall willfully kill or cause the death of the President or Vice-President of the United States, or any officer thereof upon whom the powers and duties of the President may devolve, or the sovereign or chief magistrate of any foreign country; and the same penalty is inflicted upon any person who shall attempt to commit either of these offenses. It punishes by imprisonment not exceeding ten years any person who shall instigate, advise, or counsel the killing, or conspire with others, or by spoken words, or by written or printed words, uttered or published, threaten to kill or advise or instigate another to kill, and provides that any person who has conspired as aforesaid may be indicted and convicted separately, although the other party or parties to the conspiracy are not indicted or convicted; and that any person who shall willfully and knowingly aid in the escape from punishment of any person guilty of any of the above offenses shall be punished as if a principal.

This bill includes not only the President, but the Vice-President and other persons in the line of succession, as well as the heads of foreign states. These additional provisions are important and necessary. We should prevent by law, so far as possible, assassins taking up their abode in this country mainly for the purpose of crossing the Atlantic at a convenient and opportune time to assassinate a foreign ruler.

Although no person who has attempted to assassinate the President of the United States has escaped justice, our present Federal laws are manifestly defective and inadequate in that they make no provision for the punishment of persons who kill or attempt to kill the Chief Magistrate. Had President McKinley been shot in Rhode Island or Maine, or in any other State where capital punishment has been abolished, the punishment of the assassin would have been limited to imprisonment for life. Had the assault on the President not proved fatal, the maximum penalty for his would-be murderer, under the laws of New York, would have been but ten years.

The Constitution vests the executive power in the President, and gives Congress the power to make all laws necessary for carrying into execution the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government. Every government has the inherent power of self-preservation. The Supreme Court has often said that the Government was endowed with all the powers necessary for its own preservation. With the possible exception of treason, the assassination of the President is the highest known crime against the United States; and the power of Congress to pass laws for the punishment of crimes against the United States has always been recognized and exercised.

In addition to Senator HOAR'S bill, some further protection may be afforded in more liberal extradition treaties, which possibly should cover an international police surveillance of the class of revolutionary anarchists who instigate and advise assassination. The opinion expressed by some that the present situation justifies the passage of very stringent laws respecting immigration and naturalization, I do not entertain. Although most of the anarchists in this country are aliens, or of alien descent, it is a fact worthy of mention that with the exception of the hopelessly insane Lawrence, no alien or naturalized person has ever raised his hand against the President of the United States.

The whole question of the protection of the life of the President is one of the elimination of chances. This investigation has led me to conclude that the primary thing is to safeguard the President's person, and that this should be supplemented by legislation along the lines considered. Among the reasons for thankfulness for this invitation to address the New Hampshire Bar Association is the opportunity it has afforded for some examination into the causes of the strikingly anomalous situation of the country concerning the assassinations of its Chief Magistrates. I can not express the gratification which I have derived in satisfying my own mind that the principal cause is largely owing to carelessness and neglect, and does not lie deeper in the character of our people or Government.

No! The liberty of this country is not the liberty of assassination. Our dream of self-government has not proved a delusion. The struggle and sacrifices of mankind have not been in vain. The nation still remains the home of freedom, law, and justice. Each of these terrible tragedies has only added strength and unity to the Republic. The world has never witnessed such a tribute of love for a ruler, of devotion to a government, as when the martyred McKinley was laid at rest amid the hush of traffic and industry, and the nation, in silent prayer, stood like a statue upon whose brow was beating the soft, pure light of liberty.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I had supposed there would be something said by those who are in favor of the bill in its present shape. If such is not the case, I have something to say; but if there is anything to be said in favor of the bill in its present form, of course I will defer my remarks for the present.

Mr. PATTERSON. I desire to offer some amendments.

Mr. HOAR. The other day I stated the purpose of the bill. I said all that I supposed would be necessary to have it understood by the Senate when it was up the other day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I desire to offer the following amendments. I wish to state that if I had been here yesterday before the Senate adjourned I would have offered them and had them printed, so that they would have been before the Senate this morning. I ask that the amendments which I offer be printed, so that we may have them before us to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have them read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendments will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. PATTERSON to the bill (S. 3653) for the protection of the President of the United States, and for other purposes, viz:

Strike out all after the words "Constitution and laws," in line 8 of section 1, and insert the following: "under circumstances and in manner that constitute the killing murder at common law; and any person who shall willfully kill or cause the death of the sovereign or chief magistrate of any foreign country under circumstances and in manner that constitute the killing murder at common law shall be punished with death; and an accessory before or after any such offense shall be deemed a principal, and be punished with death, and any such accessory may be indicted, tried, and punished, although the other party or parties to such offense has not or have not been indicted or convicted."

Insert the word "feloniously" after the word "thereof" in line 13 of section 2.

Strike out all after the word "thereof," in line 3, section 3, and insert the following: "Unlawfully and feloniously conspire to murder either of the officials mentioned in section 1 shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding twenty years; and any person who has conspired as aforesaid may be indicted and convicted separately, although the other party or parties to the conspiracy are not indicted or convicted."

Strike out sections 4, 5, and 6.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be printed and lie on the table.

PROMOTION OF COMMERCE.

Mr. FRYE (Mr. PLATT of Connecticut in the chair). Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent that the final votes may be had on the bill known as the shipping bill and all pending amendments, without debate, on Monday a week, at 3 o'clock.

Mr. BACON. That includes amendments offered at that time?

Mr. FRYE. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the bill known as the shipping bill may be voted upon without further debate one week from Monday, at 3 o'clock, including all pending amendments and amendments that may be offered at that time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3653) for the protection of the President of the United States and for other purposes.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if this bill is to pass in any shape, it seems to me that it ought to be very materially amended. I have offered some amendments which it seems to me are essential to the purpose really of those who favor the bill. Without those amendments, and possibly without some others, I shall be constrained to vote against the measure and in consequence I think it is proper to give the reasons why I should do so.

Mr. President, standing as we do right in the immediate presence of the awful tragedy of the assassination of the late President of the United States, it requires somewhat of resolution to oppose a bill the avowed purpose of which is to prevent the recurrence of so great a calamity. The universal desire that there should not be a recurrence of so great an outrage, the universal desire that there should be something done to prevent it, leads the public generally, and even Senators, when a bill for the purpose is presented, to be controlled in the opinions formed by the purpose which it has in view rather than by the means which it is sought to inaugurate to accomplish the purpose.

The killing of President McKinley naturally inclines us all to the adoption of most rigid and drastic methods, and I desire to say for myself that, so far as that unhappy and calamitous occurrence can affect my view, it would certainly incline me in the direction which I have indicated. I entertained a most sincere personal attachment for him. I am glad of the opportunity to say here what I have said elsewhere, that he was without exception the most amiable, the most courteous, the most pleasant man I ever met in high station, and that, so far as I was personally concerned, while I did not belong to the same political party with him, I ever received from him not only the utmost courtesy, but unvaryingly the kindest personal consideration. I personally mourned his death, and I regard his loss as a great national calamity.

So that I repeat, Mr. President, so far as the fact of the great outrage which was perpetrated in his assassination could have an influence upon me, the entire tendency is toward a reconciliation of myself even to measures which might not entirely meet my approval. While considering measures to prevent the recurrence of such a calamity in the future, there must be in our minds some reference to that which has brought the subject so vividly to our attention at this time.

Mr. President, there are very grave questions involved. Naturally, when the question of the adoption of such a bill as this is brought up the question is asked, Are you not in favor of protecting the President of the United States and those who by law are appointed to succeed him? Why, most assuredly, we all are. But in response to that question I say two things: In the first place, the proposed bill is not necessary for the purpose, and in the second place, it in no wise, so far as I can see, improves the means for the prevention of such a crime.

If there had been the assassination of a President and if the perpetrator had escaped, there would be a crying necessity for some legislation which would prevent the escape of anyone in the future; but there has been no such experience, and there can be no such experience. There is not a State in this Union which has not laws by which the President, as well as any other person, is protected from assassination. There is not a State in this Union where it would be possible for one who had assassinated a President to escape the punishment which he deserved. The world is not large enough for one who commits such a crime to be out of the reach of the arm of the law, and there is not a place secret enough in which he could hide himself from avenging justice.

It was according to the designs of the framers of our Government that the criminal law should be administered by the States, and whether there is power in the Federal Government to enact such a law as this or not, to enact it is impliedly to say that there is not, in the opinion of Congress, the reliance which there should be in the States to enforce their criminal laws.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DEPEW. The Senator from Georgia stated that the laws of the several States take ample care of a crime of this character. For about a week after President McKinley was assaulted it was supposed that he would recover. An investigation was made by the criminal authorities of Erie County, N. Y., where the crime was committed, in case the President recovered, as to what punishment the laws of the State of New York provided for that assault and attempt to kill, and it was discovered that the laws were wholly inadequate, that the criminal could be pursued only the same as if the crime had been committed against any ordinary person in the same county. So that, so far as protection for the President in New York is concerned—and I think in all the States of the Union—where an attempt is made on the life of the President I do not think that there is any remedy provided by the State law, and I do not know that there could be.

We can take care of attempts against the President of the United States in a Federal way, but I doubt if the States could provide legislation which would differentiate between the President of the United States and any other citizen of the State.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator has rather anticipated a branch of the argument to which I am coming. I shall endeavor to speak with reference to that later. I am very frank, however, to say to the Senator and to the Senate that that leads up to perhaps the only feature in this bill where there may be a claim—although the correctness of that is by many not admitted—that State law would, in the judgment of some, be insufficient; but I had not reached that part of the argument.

When interrupted by the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] I was speaking of the fact as to the killing. I was speaking of the case where the President had been killed, where he had been assassinated. I had not reached the point of the question of an attempt to kill or of an assault.

I had remarked, Mr. President, that the laws of every State, if enforced, and, so far as I know, the laws of each State, would deal out to the assassin the same penalty which this law proposes to inflict upon him. I was saying that for that reason this bill, so far as it related to that feature, where there was an assassination was unnecessary.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but several of the States have laws against capital punishment. They would not in those States deal out the same measure of punishment which this proposed law will inflict. Is not that so?

Mr. BACON. That may be true. I do not know the fact that States have laws against capital punishment, but I am coming to that branch of the argument, if the Senator will permit, before I get through, as the question of the right and propriety of the Federal Government undertaking to have a criminal law to be enforced within a State which shall be different from the law of the State itself. So far as the infliction of the death penalty is concerned, there is no deterrent to the anarchist in the prospect of death, because he undertakes to commit the offense with the full knowledge and consciousness of the fact that he is to forfeit his life.

But, Mr. President, these are preliminary considerations, and are not addressed to the particular matters to which I ask the attention of the Senate, and which are involved in the amendment I have offered.

I presume it will be admitted by all that, so far as the mere crime of assassination is concerned as it relates to the individual, the Federal Government has no jurisdiction or power to inflict a penalty upon one who assassinates the President, but that the whole power, the sole power, will be found in the office of the Government to protect against assassination if assassination be directed against one on account of his official position or on account of his official acts.

I can not state that more clearly than it is stated by Judge Aldrich, of the district court of New Hampshire, in an article which he published in the December number of the North American Review, and which I will read, in which the distinction is clearly drawn between the assassination of an individual, although he may be the President, for another cause, and the assassination of the President because he is President or because of some particular act performed by him while President. This is the first paragraph in the article in the December number of the North American Review:

Czolgosz killed Mr. McKinley, not because he was William McKinley, but because he was President of the United States; not because of his personality, but because he represented the idea of law and government. The violence was directed against the official rather than against the private individual; against the office, not the man. All the surrounding circumstances, as well as the admission of the assassin, show that personal malice, ordinarily present in crime, was altogether absent, and that malice against the idea of government was present. The motive for the fatal shot was not to destroy McKinley, except as a step in the direction of destroying the idea of government and law, which, for the time being, he represented as the head of the executive branch of the Government. Mr. McKinley was the representative of the people in respect to their idea of government, and the blow being directed against the idea, it follows that the real crime was against the people and their government rather than against McKinley as an individual.

I am going to read that, in part, in another connection upon another branch of the subject. I read it now because it expresses more clearly than I can myself express the distinction between the killing of an official because he is an official, or by reason of the fact that he had performed official function, and the killing of him as an individual for some reason entirely outside of his official position.

I want to call attention to the bill in order that the purpose of my amendment may be clearly understood. The bill reads in this way:

That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, willfully kill or cause the death of the President or Vice-President of the United States—

That is sufficient for the purpose I now have. The bill goes on to enumerate other persons, and then provides—shall be punished with death.

The Senate will remark that there is no limitation whatever upon these words. There is an absence even of that which is found ordinarily in the law, I believe, and which is necessary to express, that it is done maliciously or in such a way that it will constitute murder. It is the unlimited condemnation of any one who shall kill this official. I am limiting this consideration now to the President and Vice-President, because it is easier to do that than to enumerate all these various officers as we go along. The principle is the same in each case. The amendment which I offer is, after the words "United States"—that is, after the words which I have already read—to insert these words:

because of his official position, or for the purpose of destroying the Government or impairing the execution of its constitutional powers.

I am not wedded to that language. I will state that this language was suggested to me by a distinguished Senator of great experience in this body, and that he has since suggested a possible change in the language from the words "constitutional powers" to "governmental powers." I think that was his suggestion. I will state that that was the suggestion of the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

I hope Senators will give careful consideration to the suggestion as to the propriety of the introduction of these words, and they will see that no case can possibly arise where a President of the United States would be assassinated by an anarchist, outside of any assassination which might occur from other causes entirely personal to the President, but what would come within that restriction or that limitation "because of his official position."

That certainly would have included the crime of the assassination of Mr. McKinley. The assassin had no other motive; he avowed that that was his motive, and that is the motive of all anarchists, as stated by Judge Aldrich in the paragraph which I have read.

Czolgosz killed Mr. McKinley, not because he was William McKinley, but because he was President of the United States; not because of his personality, but because he represented the idea of law and government. The violence was directed against the official, rather than against the private individual; against the office, not the man.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator a question, if he does not object.

Mr. BACON. I have no objection whatever.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator this question: How could that be proved beyond a reasonable doubt? Judge Aldrich is speaking of the historical probabilities in such a case; but in courts of justice we have to prove a motive, if motive be the essence of the crime, beyond a reasonable doubt. I should think a skillful advocate might in all three of the cases, certainly in the last two, of the assassinations of the President have raised a very serious doubt as to whether there might not have been some personal motive other than that growing out of official character.

Mr. BACON. I will say that I think the Senator from Massachusetts, if he were on the bench, would take this view of it: Suppose that this assassin had not avowed, as he did avow, that he had no other motive. He said that he killed the President because he was President, because he had power that no man ought to exercise. Of course that would have convicted him. But suppose——

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, if it will not disturb the Senator in the least—I can in this way bring out better the point I wish to make than by an elaborate reply—I will say what this bill means to punish is the crime of interruption of the Government of the United States and the destruction of its security by striking down the life of the person who is actually in the exercise of the executive power, or of such persons as have been constitutionally and lawfully provided to succeed thereto in case of a vacancy. It is important to this country that the interruption shall not take place for an hour, and it is important to the security of the country that there be an official provided who will make that certain. If the man willfully—because, of course, otherwise he is not punishable—mean to do that thing, he has committed one of the gravest and most dangerous and most injurious of public offenses. It is that we wish to prevent and punish. That is the theory on which this bill is drawn.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think I understood that, although I did not have the pleasure of hearing the statement from the Senator when he was on the floor before. It was made during my temporary absence from the Chamber. I would have been very glad to have heard the statement this morning before I began my speech; but that does not change the fact.

The Senator made the suggestion in his prior interruption that it would be difficult to prove—and that is his objection to my amendment—what was the purpose and intent, and I was proceeding to answer that when the Senator suggested something else. I was about to say that I think that if the Senator were himself on the bench and a man was being tried before him who had assaulted the President; if that man stood mute, and it was shown that he was a stranger to the President; that so far as anyone knew he had never seen him before, the Senator, sitting upon the bench, would instruct the jury that the presumption was that the man had done this thing because of the fact that the one he attacked was President, and that therefore he was guilty of an infraction of this law.

Mr. President, we have had three of these lamentable assassinations, and there has been no case in which there would have been any difficulty in convicting either one of the assassins under the law as proposed if it had in it the amendment which I have offered. In the case of the assassination of Mr. McKinley there was the avowal on the part of the assassin that that was his reason—that he killed the President simply because he was President. And, as I have said, in the absence of any avowal, the circumstances under which the assassination occurred would have raised a presumption of the fact which would have been ruled by any court.

In the case of the assassination of Mr. Garfield there would have been no difficulty in making the proof, and it would have come under the words "for destroying the Government or impairing the execution of its constitutional powers" or "governmental powers."

The same would have been true if Booth had been tried by a civil court. But the point I make, Mr. President, which it seems to me makes it essential that we should guard this bill by the amendments I propose, is that if the killing is for other than the reasons described in this amendment it is a matter within the jurisdiction of the States.

It is entirely possible for a President of the United States—it is certainly entirely possible for one of these subordinate officers who are intended to be put in the same category as the President—to be assassinated for some reason other than that connected with his official position.

Why, Mr. President, a burglar might enter the room in which one of these heads of Departments was, without even knowing that he was the head of a Department, and in the effort to commit a burglary, and to avoid detection or arrest, he might commit a murder. Would anybody say that if one of those Secretaries was in a country house and there should be an occurrence of that kind there would be jurisdiction under the Constitution of the United States to take away from the State the right to try the man who committed the offense? You may say the man was a burglar and committed murder, and it does not make much difference whether he be tried by the one or the other, but the point is, that laws are made so that if one innocent of crime is accused he may have the benefit of certain guarantees. Here is the case of a burglary committed, and a murder of the head of a Department, who is included in the terms of this bill, the man charged with the assassination has the constitutional guaranty of a trial in his own county under the laws of his own State. Here is a murder charged to have been committed by one to whom this man was an entire stranger; he may be an entirely innocent man, and yet he must be carried before a Federal court, away from his home—possibly more than 100 miles—and tried under a law, and denied the right which the laws of the land give him, that for an offense committed in his State, or an offense charged against him to have been committed in his State, he shall have the right of trial in a certain way.

Why, Mr. President, it is altogether possible even for the President of the United States to be assaulted by a man who does not know that he is the President of the United States. There can be no motive there to interrupt the Government or to destroy its functions. We have had a rumor—I do not know how true—that there had been in a not very remote time in the past an occasion where the President of the United States came in collision with a drunken man who did not know he was President. Of course if that occurred in the District of Columbia it would make no difference as to State or Federal law, because there would be no conflict of jurisdiction; but it is a serious question when you propose to take away the jurisdiction of a State over matters which from the foundation of the Government to the present time have been conceded to belong to the exclusive jurisdiction of the State. It is a serious matter when enacting a Federal criminal statute to fail to so guard the law as to get it within the only limits under which that law can be justified or maintained.

Mr. President, I do not want to pursue this matter at any great length; but there is one other very serious consideration in this case, to my mind, and that is as to the constitutionality of the bill. I will admit that there is very grave difficulty in the question which I am now about to present; but it is a difficulty which rests on both sides.

Practically, Mr. President—and I ask the serious attention of lawyers to this suggestion—this is an enlargement of the law of treason. It is practically an effort to make, not in name, but in fact, that treason which the Constitution of the United States declares shall not be treason. What is treason? Of course we know what it is under our Constitution, but what, in the broad sense, is treason?

It is the effort to overthrow lawful authority—to destroy lawful authority. That is one kind of treason—to betray the Government to its enemies and by force to stop the exercise of the proper governmental functions.

Now, the time was when it was left for the courts to say what was treason, and up to the time of Edward III the courts were very liberal in ruling what acts constituted treason, and in order to limit it within proper bounds, by the act of Edward III, treason was defined, and acts outside of that were no longer treason.

Now, the point I am coming to is this: There were, if I recollect aright, seven divisions of treason mentioned in the act of Edward III. I have them here enumerated in one of the volumes of Blackstone's Commentaries. One act of treason was:

> When a man doth compass or imagine the death of our lord the king, of our lady his queen, or of their eldest son and heir.

That was the first. The second and third I pass over as not material to be mentioned now. The fourth was this:

> If a man be adherent to the king's enemies in his realm, giving to them aid and comfort in the realm or elsewhere—

He is also declared guilty of high treason. Passing over the fifth and sixth, the seventh is as follows:

> If a man slay the chancellor, treasurer, or the king's justices of the one bench or the other, justice in eyre, or justices of assize, and all other justices assigned to hear and determine, being in their places doing their offices.

Now, the point to which I wish to ask the attention of lawyers in the Senate is this: When the constitutional convention came to consider the question of treason they had that act of Edward III before them. I have here Elliot's Debates. That clause in the Constitution which defines and limits treason was made in a discussion in which the act of Edward III was brought into direct mention and notice more than once, and the Senate will observe that the language of the Constitution in limiting treason to the levying of war against the United States and to adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort, is taken almost literally from the fourth section of the act of Edward III. The act of Edward III provided that the killing of the king should be treason. It provided that the killing of the officers of the Government should be treason, and the framers of the Constitution of the United States, with that act before them and discussing it, reject both of those and say they shall not constitute treason, and they take the single fourth division and, copying it almost literally, say that, and that only, shall be treason.

The point to which I wish to ask the attention of the Senate is this: Did the framers of the Constitution, when they were defining treason and when they were saying that only—they used the word "only"—certain acts shall constitute treason, mean simply to limit the power of the Congress or of the Government to use the word "treason" when they came to enact a law prescribing the penalty of treason? Did they simply mean to deny to them the enactment of a statute prescribing a penalty for an offense which they would say should be called "treason?" Or did they mean to say that when Congress came to enact laws prescribing a punishment against any attempted overthrow of the Government, or any attempted destruction of any part of the governmental function, they should be confined to those particular acts and should not go beyond them?

Mr. HOAR. Has not that point, which I agree is a very lawyer-like point, been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in cases where they have held valid the legislation of Congress for the protection of Government officers against obstructions and assaults in the discharge of their duty and interrupting them in the discharge of their duty? I understand the Senator's proposition is that it is not the word "treason," but the substance of the attack on the Government in its operation or working, to which Congress was limited. Now, if we may provide by law, as the courts I believe have held, that an attack on or an obstruction of an officer of the United States in the discharge of his duties, made within the limits of any State, shall be punishable, it can not make any difference, certainly in principle, that this is the head of the Government or that these other persons are officers who are in the line of succession to the Executive power. The question is whether that point has been debated and settled.

Mr. BACON. The Senator's suggestion is one which had not escaped my attention, and it is one of the features which I had in view when I spoke of the fact that it is a question not without difficulty. But there must be some line of demarcation between the offenses which are in their nature treason, and which under the statute of Edward III were also made treason, and which the Constitution of the United States expressly excluded, and another class of minor offenses, such as those suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

This bill proceeds upon the theory that the attack on the President of the United States is destructive of the functions of Government. As stated by Judge Aldrich, I believe it was, in this paper, certainly by some writer whom I have been reading from recently, the Government as now constituted can not go on without the Executive, and therefore the purpose of this proposed law is to provide a penalty for that which is in its nature destructive of Government, and therefore that which in its nature must be under the general, broad acceptation of the term treason.

And yet the framers of the Constitution, when they came together to consider the question, determined that they would not make an assault upon the Executive treason, but expressly said that it should not be treason, but that he should stand like every other citizen before the law, and that one who committed a crime against his person should not be guilty of treason, but should be guilty of murder. The fact is not to be overlooked that in the act of Edward III there are some offenses enumerated and made treasonable which are not in their nature treasonable, and their exclusion from the constitutional paragraph defining treason does not signify anything; but the exclusion of offenses which are in their nature treasonable signifies a great deal.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I appreciate very much the able and interesting speech which is being made by the Senator from Georgia; and if it will not interfere with him, I should like to ask him a question. In order to do so I will be compelled to make a statement of a sentence or two.

Mr. BACON. I shall be very happy to have the Senator do so.

Mr. CULBERSON. At common law, as the Senator has indicated, there are several acts which, being done by a party, would be treason. Among them are the acts which have been named by the Senator from Georgia. Among others which were treason at common law or by the British statutes was counterfeiting coin of the realm. Counterfeiting is not treason under the Constitution of the United States, but it is punishable by the statutes of the United States as a felony. Crimes at common law were divided into treason, felonies, and misdemeanors.

The question with me, and the question with the Senator from Georgia, as I understand, is whether the framers of the Constitution, having limited the acts which would constitute treason against the United States, thereby prohibited Congress from punishing as a felony or misdemeanor other acts which were treason at common law or under the English statutes.

It is an interesting question. I confess I disagree with the intimation of the Senator from Georgia on this branch of his argument, but I agree with him on the first branch.

Mr. President, I have made this statement simply to get my idea before the Senator from Georgia, that he may assist me, as one required to pass upon this intricate and delicate question, to come to a correct conclusion about it.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BAILEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I desire to submit what I wish to say in the time of the Senator from Georgia, that he, with others, may have the opportunity to reflect upon what I have to suggest, and in occupying the floor I will refer to the amendments which I have offered, because they embody my views of this unusually important question.

I agree with the purpose of the Senator from Massachusetts; that is, to punish by a Federal statute whoever murders a President or within the limits of the United States murders the head of any foreign government. But I can not concur at all with the proposed statute by which that is to be done. I think there is a necessity for a Federal statute upon that subject, for this reason, if for no other. It was suggested, I think, by the Senator from Connecticut. In some of the States there is no law that punishes by death the crime of murder. At least in one of the States the ordering of the death penalty after a conviction is dependent upon the will of the governor. However heinous the transaction might be, in which a President or other high official of the Government was concerned, it might be that the offender would simply be imprisoned for life, subject, as a matter of course, to the exercise of clemency by the governor of the State, if he should be punished only by imprisonment, at any time after the sentence was put in effect.

In other of the States, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, the degree of punisment is left with the jury. They not only find a defendant guilty or not guilty, but if they find a defendant guilty, they may affix the penalty. We can well understand what the state of public mind would have been if the President had been murdered by Czolgosz in the State of Iowa where the death penalty is not in force. I think it would have resulted in an uprising by the people. I think the State would have been disgraced by a mob. I do not believe there is any American community which would have tolerated for a moment the offense that was committed by Czolgosz to be expiated simply by imprisonment.

Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I am in sympathy with the proposition that there shall be a law, the same throughout the country, for the punishment of whoever murders a President of the United States or the head of any foreign government who may be killed within the limits of the United States.

I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that the differentiation he seeks to make by his amendment will be productive of very serious confusion, with the possible escape of one who might kill the President. For instance, if his amendment was adopted and the defendant should be indicted in the Federal court, one of the questions necessarily submitted to a jury would be whether or not, although the killing of the President was felonious and did in fact constitute the crime of murder, the attack was made not at the individual, but really at the office which he held. In that event the court would be required to instruct the jury, if such was the law, that although the jury might believe that the killing of the President was felonious and was murder at common law, yet if the killing was the result of some private grievance and not by reason of his hatred of the Government, or by a desire to destroy the Government or throw the Government into confusion, it would be the duty of the jury to acquit.

Then would come the very serious question whether or not that defendant had not been once in jeopardy, and if, being acquitted by a Federal jury, he should be indicted under the State law for the crime of murder alone, it might be a very serious problem whether the courts would not be compelled to hold that he had been in jeopardy for that offense and therefore he could not be tried. I can see great difficulty in attempting to differentiate the killing of a President as the result of a private grievance or to attain some object that does not affect the Government and the killing of the President because of hatred of the Government and to destroy or seriously impede its operations. Therefore I am entirely willing, in order that no such troubles and difficulties as those may arise, that a law shall be passed which will inflict the death penalty by a Federal statute and at the hands of a Federal official by the verdict and judgment in a Federal court on one who murders a President.

The trouble with me commences when I read the language of the bill. For instance, take the first section:

> Any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, willfully kill or cause the death of the President or Vice-President of the United States—

"Willfully kill." I take it that every lawyer who reflects will recall that there may be perfectly innocent willful killings. "Willful" means with deliberation, with premeditation, voluntarily. I am aware that when the word "willful" is applied to criminal law it has a sinister meaning which does not necessarily attach to the word in connection with other laws or other things. But, nevertheless, after all, a man may willfully kill the President of the United States, or anybody else, and be entirely guiltless of any crime, moral or legal, unless we shall undertake to make it a crime.

The President of the United States may be killed in self-defense. The slayer would willfully kill him; that is, voluntarily kill him and intentionally kill him. It would be a willful killing, but it would be a justifiable killing. A President may engage in an encounter in which in the heat of blood by a passion irresistible he may be slain; and yet to a degree at least that is a willful killing.

My notion about it, and I ask the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to it, is that all that should be enacted into a statute of this kind is that whoever murders a President of the United States or the head of a foreign government or the other officials mentioned in the proposed act shall suffer death.

In connection with that, accessories either before or after the fact shall suffer death. In addition to that, those guilty of entering into a conspiracy to murder the President or the other officials mentioned shall receive the punishment that may be declared; and then, in addition to these things, that those who are accessories or those who are coconspirators may be indicted and tried and punished, although the others who engaged in the commission of the offense, the principals it may be, may not be indicted, tried, or punished. When those things are accomplished, it seems to me we have done everything that the Congress of the United States should be asked to do to protect by law the life of the President or any other official of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. I arise, Mr. President, because the Senator from Colorado has invited my attention to a point. I should like to ask the Senator whether it is not now, if not a universal, yet a very general method of legislation in regard to all crimes in our modern codes and in our creations of new offenses to describe the act of which the offense consists and to leave to ordinary implication and presumption the matter of justifiable cause? So, if in any State or Territory—in any court, national or State—the court had to administer a law which punished the willful killing or slaying of a person, or a willful assault upon anybody, would not justifiable cause, like self-defense or insanity, which, in the last analysis, means that the man did not do it, because there was no intelligence behind his act, or it may be so stated, at any rate be recognized, as a valid defense without putting into the statute affirmatively that it shall be so recognized?

Of course it is very easy, although I do not myself think it is worth while, to put into the proposed statute the words "without justifiable cause" after the word "willfully," which, I suppose, would remove the difficulty. But I suppose that this bill is in that particular according to the modern custom in legislation.

Mr. PATTERSON. To the question of the Senator from Massachusetts I answer yes and I answer no. If he will examine the Federal statutes, he will discover that where the Government punishes murder or homicide committed within the Federal jurisdiction it always uses the word "murder." The principles of the common law being operative throughout the United States in connection with crimes, the use of the word "murder" makes the offense of murder that which was cognizable at common law. At common law homicide was divided into that which was justifiable and murder and manslaughter, so that when our Federal statute declares as to whoever shall murder another in a navy-yard, within the limits of a custom-house, upon territory that is under the jurisdiction of the United States, Congress means that the person when tried shall be tried for murder, and the murder must be defined in the indictment with all the care and particularity of a charge for murder at common law.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think I made myself quite clear.

Mr. PATTERSON. I was going to come to it.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the Senator will allow me to call his attention to one thing I have discovered since. I agree that what the Senator says about murder is true, that it involves the absence of justifiable cause, but this is a statute offense we are creating. Now, the question which I put was whether it was not the almost universal custom in drafting penal statutes to describe the fact which makes the offense, and when that is aptly described the court always holds that the usual justification shall be open as a defense, though not mentioned.

I turned hastily to the statutes of the United States and looked at the first I came to in the index:

> If any master of a vessel coming into or having arrived at any port of the United States shall obstruct or hinder or shall intentionally cause any obstruction or hindrance to any officer lawfully going on board such vessel, he shall be liable to a penalty, etc.

Now, suppose the officer going on board the vessel made an assault or was endeavoring an assault upon the master and he repelled it and defended it. There are a thousand cases of justifiable cause. Not one of them is mentioned in the statute. I think the Senator will find that all through modern legislation.

Mr. PATTERSON. That, Mr. President, is a misdemeanor. I do not believe that the looseness of language of that kind would be at all applicable to grave felonies, capital offenses. I do not believe that any case can be found in which a serious felony is thus loosely defined.

I was going on to suggest that the State legislatures have undertaken in many instances to particularly describe and define different degrees of murder. In our State we have murder in the first and the second degree, and then we have voluntary and involuntary manslaughter. They have divided two offenses at common law into four offenses, and in doing that it was necessary for them to discriminate, to use language to describe the one offense and the other offenses.

But I do not believe that a parallel case can be found where language will be used in a capital case or a serious felony for the purpose of describing an offense in which the language is altogether compatible with perfect and entire innocence. I suggest to the senior Senator from Massachusetts that when he examines the statutes of the United States as to all high offenses he will find, if it is homicide which is to be declared a felony as a capital offense, it is described as murder, and to rob and steal, if they have reference to personal property belonging to the Government of the United States; and every word thus used has a technical and well-defined meaning at the common law, and when used in a law and in an indictment carries with it everything that is essential to constitute that a crime at the common law.

But where you say "one who shall willfully kill another," you simply in terms declare that one who has committed no offense against the moral law may be guilty of a statutory offense; that one who, if the offense was directed in a State at some private individual, would do an act for which he would be exonerated upon trial by the verdict of a jury necessarily under the instructions of the court, when that act is committed against a certain official of the United States it shall constitute a crime, and a capital crime, for which he shall be punished. No law of such a serious nature should leave the hands of Congress in that condition.

I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that if he will read the amendments which I have offered and which will be printed in the morning, it will be found that they provide for the punishment of the following offenses: For the murder of a President, the head of a foreign government, or the heads of departments such as are mentioned in his bill, they shall suffer death. That whoever shall feloniously attempt to commit the offenses mentioned in the first section, as the first section will be if the amendment is adopted, shall also suffer death, because then it would be a felonious attempt to murder one or the other of these officials.

It next provides that accessories before or after the fact shall be guilty of the principal offense and shall suffer death. It then denounces a conspiracy to commit these offenses and provides that one of the conspirators may be indicted and tried and punished, although other members of the conspiracy may not be indicted, tried, and punished. It also provides that the accessories before or after the fact may be indicted, tried, and convicted and suffer the penalty of death, although the principals may not be indicted, tried, and convicted.

Now, when the law thus provides, I ask Senators what additional crimes do you want to embrace in the statute that is proposed? To the crimes that are provided for in sections 4, 5, and 6 I desire to enter my most earnest and emphatic protest.

Mr. SPOONER. Sections 4, 5, and 6?

Mr. PATTERSON. Sections 5 and 6 are the provisions I refer to. The crime mentioned in section 4 is provided for in one of the amendments, and is a part, I think, of section 2 as the section I have suggested stands. Now comes section 5:

> That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, by spoken words, or by written or printed words, uttered or published, threaten to kill or advise or instigate another to kill the President or Vice-President of the United States * * * shall be punished, etc.

Here is an offense created without a conspiracy, without a single overt act being committed, an offense that may be commited simply by word of mouth by one man, or by the stroke of a pen held in the hands of one man:

> Threaten to kill or advise or instigate.

Let me suggest a possibility. The opponent of an Administration makes a speech. He uses strong language. He denounces the Administration in bitter terms. He goes far beyond what the law of decorum in public debate either in this Chamber or upon the outside would justify. Nevertheless, he is clearly within his constitutional rights. He declares that the President has been guilty of malfeasance in office; that he has been guilty of making appointments through improper influences; that his Administration under his lead and guidance is ruining the country, and will result in permanent injury to every citizen. Some person influenced by those words, perhaps, kills the President. Would not the person who made such a speech be liable to indictment upon the charge of having instigated the murder of the President?

A man in his idle moments utters a threat against the President, saying, "Why, he ought to be killed." He says it in the heat of passion, yet without any evil intent in his mind. Under that section he would be subject to grave and serious persecution accompanied with prosecution, the charge being that he had threatened to kill the President; that he had advised the killing of the President, or had instigated his death.

There ought to be no offense created, Mr. President, that consists simply of language used by one person unaccompanied by any overt act. If there is a conspiracy, then there must be two or more. Then they combine with deliberation and evil intent and well-defined purpose to commit an unlawful act. There can be no conspiracy without the deliberate mind to commit a crime. But any man who indulges in severe denunciation, in severe criticism, in unjust criticism, or who makes a suggestion in the heat of passion or makes a threat that many people are constantly making, I will not say against the President, but against others, would be liable, and justly liable, under this section to indictment and to prosecution, and it would depend upon the sense of justice——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the unfinished business will be laid before the Senate. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1348) to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and the common defense; to promote commerce, and to encourage the deep-sea fisheries.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I do not desire to take the Senator from Colorado off the floor. I am perfectly willing, as far as I am concerned, that the Senator shall complete his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia make that request?

Mr. CLAY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Colorado be allowed to conclude.

Mr. SPOONER. Let the request be for unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside until the Senator from Colorado shall finish his remarks.

Mr. BACON. As I may not wish to interrupt the Senate after the Senator from Colorado concludes, I simply wish to remind the Senate that I had the floor. The Senator from Colorado is now engaged in an interruption. I am perfectly willing that the Senator shall proceed.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to enter my protest against that. No doubt the Senator from Georgia will get the floor again whenever he desires to resume it, but certainly the Senator had not the right to assign the floor to another Senator to make a speech.

Mr. BACON. I have not made any such arrangement. The Senator from Colorado asked me if he might interrupt me and I consented, simply as I consented a while ago to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts, and he spoke for five minutes. It is simply a question of degree. The Senator from Colorado is speaking a little longer than the Senator from Massachusetts. That is the only difference between the two cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid temporarily aside.

Mr. BACON. I am entering no objection. I am perfectly willing that that shall be done.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator from Colorado will be allowed to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent has been asked that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I was discussing the provisions of section 5, to which I am unalterably opposed. It introduces new elements, or it extracts from crimes simple elements of crime and makes each distinct element a separate and distinct crime. I think the more Senators will read and reflect upon the wide possibilities of section 5, as proposed by the Judiciary Committee, the more they will be convinced that it is not a sea that this country should undertake to navigate. It comes mightily near being the lese majesty of Germany, the mere finding fault with, the criticising, the denunciation of the king, or the head of government.

Whenever you can give something tangible that has for its object the commission of a substantial offense, so far as I am concerned I would favor its adoption. But when I realize that a bitter partisan may from the public stump deliver utterances innocent in themselves and within the range of legitimate public discussion as it has always been understood within the limits of the United States, and under this or a new act be guilty of a crime, I am not in favor of its enactment.

Section 3 is largely of the same pattern. Under the amendments that I have presented I have stricken out most of section 3, and I call the attention of the Senate to the part that I have stricken out. Practically it is an elimination of the entire section and the substitution for it of the provisions relating to conspiracies.

Section 3 in the bill provides—

That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, instigate, advise, or counsel—

"Instigate, advise, or counsel"—

the killing of the President or Vice-President of the United States or any officer thereof upon whom the powers and duties of the President may devolve under the Constitution and laws, or shall conspire with any other person to accomplish the same, or who shall instigate, advise, or counsel the killing of the sovereign or chief magistrate of any foreign country, or shall conspire with any other person to accomplish the same, shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding twenty years.

In that section mere language, uttered in the presence of others but not intended to operate in a criminal way upon the minds of others, would be an offense. It would introduce this element into the criminal jurisprudence of the United States. A person would be guilty of an offense simply by the use of words; that is all. All lawyers know that the most unreliable testimony which is ever given in a court of justice is testimony of what somebody said. As the law books lay it down, the mere change of a word, a difference in the accentuation of a word, a change in punctuation—if you could apply that phrase to the use of spoken words—will altogether change the meaning of the language that is attempted to be repeated. It will be holding out a premium to some enemy of some person to go before an officer and make affidavit that "John Smith instigated me to kill the President," or "advised me to kill the President," or "counseled me to kill the President," and he would undertake to support that accusation by his own unsupported words.

I suggest, Mr. President, that there is no room in this country for offenses of that character. In creating offenses new to the genius and the spirit of our criminal procedure you would be offering premiums to a thousand prosecutions where no real offense existed.

Therefore I suggest, if I have used apt language in the amendments, that when we fully and completely provided against the murdering of the President and the other domestic officials mentioned in the bill and the head of a foreign government, and the accessories to the offense, and against those who conspire to commit those offenses, and provide that accessories and conspirators shall be punished, even though the principals may be neither accused nor punished, we have gone as far as wisdom will permit us to go.

I agree, as I said when I commenced, that it is wise to enact into a Federal statute provisions against the murdering of these people in order that there may be uniformity of criminal procedure in whatever section of the country the offense may be committed, and in order that there may be uniformity and certainty of punishment. In such a case the accused is tried, not perhaps in his county, but certainly within the State in which he lives or the section of the State in which a division of the circuit court of the United States may be held. Where a grave offense, where the unlawful killing of the head of this great country, is the crime that is charged against an individual, there is not much room for him to complain, even though he may not be tried within the county in which he lives, if he is tried within the judicial district in which the offense was committed.

PROMOTION OF COMMERCE.

Mr. CLAY. I ask that the unfinished business, the bill known as the shipping bill, be now taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is now before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1348) to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and the common defense; to promote commerce, and to encourage the deep-sea fisheries.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, during the debate yesterday evening the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] questioned the correctness of certain figures that I quoted from a writer in the Engineering Magazine. I believe I said the figures were made in 1890. On an examination of the authority I find they were made in 1899. I do not desire to have this article inserted until my remarks are closed, but I will ask that pages 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, down to the bottom of page 110, be inserted in my remarks. I believe the statement will be found to be on an average correct. [See Appendix C.]

But I do not see any need of debating the question as to whether materials for the construction of ships in the United States can be procured as cheaply as in any other country in the world, because the distinguished President of the Senate, and the author of this bill [Mr. FRYE], in the argument that he made to the Senate on Monday, practically admitted that the sole reason why the American shipowner could not compete with the foreign shipowner in our foreign-carrying trade was the question of labor. I thought the Senator from Ohio at the time was mistaken, and I have turned to the RECORD that I might see exactly what the Senator from Maine said. I find on an examination of the RECORD that the Senator from Maine used substantially the language which I said he used in the Senate. Now let me read it:

I say, Mr. President, in my opinion, the farmers, the manufacturers, and the wage workers of the United States would pay a penalty nearly, if not quite, equal to that paid by either of the contending parties. Now, what is the cause of this condition of things? There is only one—American wages. That is all there is to it. Nothing else has caused the condition of things which now exists. American wages increase the cost of our ships for the foreign trade at least 25 per cent.

I am as well aware as any other Senator can be that in the furnishing of raw materials to-day very likely we can supply them as cheaply as they can be supplied anywhere in the world; but the raw materials only furnish one half the cost of the ship; the construction of the ship is the other half. In that construction we pay the men who do the work twice the wages that are paid on the Clyde to-day; more than twice the wages that are paid in any German shipyard, and a good deal more than are paid in the shipyards of Norway. Our vessels to-day cost at least 25 per cent more than do those in any other country in the world.

Mr. President, when you admit that we can supply the raw material, the material for the construction of ships in the United States, as cheaply as they can be supplied in any other country in the world, then the sole question with which we have to deal is the question of labor. So if you admit the proposition, Mr. President, that we can furnish material as cheaply as any other country, you settle every other question except the question of labor.

Mr. President, I have taken the trouble to go to the RECORD to find the debate when the bill of 1891 to provide for a foreign ocean mail service was before the Senate. I found that the distinguished Senator from Maine alleged on the floor of the Senate that if that act of 1891 passed, which I believe cost the country about $1,400,000 per annum for the foreign mail service, that our merchant marine would be restored, and that the United States would again reach that position which it occupied before 1855.

Mr. President, the majority of the committee, in the report which they made during the present session of Congress, said that the act of 1891 had been an absolute failure from beginning to end and that not a single new line of vessels has been established. Every Senator who spoke in favor of that bill said that that would be all that would be necessary to restore our foreign carrying trade. Now, I predict in ten years from to-day, if we rely solely upon this act, that the same statement will be made in regard to the pending legislation.

I am aware of the fact that in all probability in a few years our merchant marine will be restored; natural conditions will cause it to be restored; cheap iron and cheap steel and cheap ships will cause it to be restored. We have reached a point now where the United States can compete with any country in the world. Then, Mr. President, you will see the friends of this bill come forward and claim that this bill is responsible for the restoration of our foreign carrying trade when natural conditions alone will be responsible for such a result.

Mr. President, during the debate the question was asked, I believe, by my colleague [Mr. BACON], Was it true that at this time the shipyards of the United States had more orders than they could fill for two or three years to come? and I understood the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to say that that was not true. I hold in my hand certain books and magazines, from which I will ask to have extracts inserted at the close of my remarks. I hold in my hand the Blue Book of American Shipping for the year 1901, which describes the progress of our shipbuilding during the last two or three years in a most interesting article. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD from that book an article entitled "Navy and merchant marine," beginning on page 4 and going on down to the end of the first paragraph on page 6. [See Appendix D.]

Again, Mr. President, to show that our shipyards are now busy, that they can not fill their orders for three or four years to come, I hold in my hand the Blue Book of American Shipping for 1900, and I ask that there may be inserted at the close of my remarks an extract from an article beginning on page 5 with the words "The development of iron and steel shipbuilding" and closing on page 6. [See Appendix E.]

Mr. President, I intended to complete my remarks yesterday evening, but now I shall complete them in a very few minutes.

To carry the comparison still further, what do we find? The difference between the wages paid and the value of the production of the average laborer in the United States was found to be $1,535.76. The difference between the wages of the average laborer in Great Britain and his production was ascertained to be $588.06, and in Germany to be only $388.80. Now, what lessons do these figures teach? The average American laborer, after deducting the cost of his wages, produces products of a value equal to $1,535. The average laborer of Great Britain produces products, after paying him his wages, of a value equal to $588.06.

These figures enable us to understand and to appreciate the report made by the German expert, Mr. Schwartz, who was recently sent to the United States by the general marine staff of his country to investigate shipbuilding interests of our country. This German expert, thoroughly skilled both in the art of constructing and operating ships, was sent by his country to study our methods; and he made a report that should be gratifying to every American citizen. This investigator says that the materials for the construction of steel ships are lower in price in the United States than any other country in the world, and the only thing to be complained of is the fluctuation of prices.

The German investigator refers to the splendid body of American workmen, earning wages from 30 per cent to 50 per cent higher than those in Great Britain, but that the wage bills in the United States are more than counterbalanced by economical processes of machinery, which are not found in European yards. He also reports that the most striking difference between German and American shipyards is found in the use of pneumatic boring, hammering, and riveting machines and pneumatic cranes in the United States. He frankly says to his own people that the new consolidation of shipbuilding companies in the United States is the largest shipbuilding concern in the world, and that it will devote its resources to economic shipbuilding, to reduce the present method of obtaining material to uniformity, and to the centralization of ship construction and its management.

The German naval constructor, in conclusion, says that the Americans, with all these means and appliances at their command, can easily put their shipbuilding industry in a position successfully to compete with the long-established English builders on the one hand and on the other with the younger but rapidly developing shipbuilders of Germany. A full account of this most interesting and instructive report was given in the Washington Post shortly after it was made. It can now be stated for a certainty that the Carnegie works are executing a large order for steel plates to be used in the construction of new steamers now being built on the Clyde and that the relative prices of this material are such that the American manufacturers pay a freight of $4 per ton and yet compete successfully with the foreign manufacturers.

But why multiply further arguments to substantiate the positions of the minority? It would be an easy task to do so, but I do not desire to worry the patience of the Senate. Now, what is the remaining position taken by the majority? They tell us that Great Britain is our great competitor; that she subsidizes her merchant marine. It is a fact and an important fact that ought to be kept before the public, that the ships of our principal competitor, Great Britain, received no Government aid in the form of a subsidy; they receive compensation for carrying the mails, and so do our ships.

Those vessels which are built and maintained in such a form as will enable them to be used in time of war receive certain compensation for the expense incurred in consequence of the changes necessary to adapt them for that purpose. The same is true of American ships under existing law. The New York Evening Post of January 28, 1902, says that all of the special shipping subsidies attempted heretofore by this country have been failures, and that the recent parliamentary inquiry on that subject showed that both the postal subsidy and naval subvention, which are the only forms of subsidy paid by the British Government, were considered by many shipowners as more of a burden than a benefit.

The mail subsidies amount to only about one-third more than the postage received on the mail matter carried, and the difference thus paid out for the Government represents the political advantage to the British Empire of maintaining regular mail communication with its distant colonies and has no special commercial significance, as the commerce of England is chiefly conducted by slower steamers, which receive no subsidy whatever, and that the payments made for the right to have merchant steamers constructed with special reference to use by the Government in case of need amount to less than $300,000 a year, and the requirements of the admiralty are so burdensome that shipowners have found little advantage in the subsidy. The same article correctly says that these payments by the British Government are not subsidies in the sense of being a bonus, but are given for value received.

The great merchant ships of Great Britain do not receive a dollar subsidy. She commands more than one-half of the carrying trade of the world with her tramp iron ships, which are seen in every port of the world, and these merchant ships have never received a cent subsidy from the English Government. These ships that dominate the ocean and are the pride of every Englishman, the great freight-carrying ships, have never had any aid from the English Government. England has paid for carrying her mails to her outlying possessions and to foreign countries, and in addition certain payments are made for the right to use certain merchant ships in case of war; but the great merchant marine of our most formidable competitor does not receive any government aid whatever.

I am tempted, Mr. President, to repeat a little history intimately connected with the origin and progress of this legislation. The report of the majority of the committee is practically the report of the present Commissioner of Navigation. They go so far as to say that he furnished the information on which said report is based. This Commissioner told us in 1894 if the laws are to be equal, and the American doctrine of equal opportunities under the laws for all is to be preserved, the privilege of the use of his own flag over his own property should be granted to every citizen on equal terms with every other citizen. He was outspoken against every form of subsidy in 1894 and 1895. The very measure we are now considering would then have received his most strenuous opposition. In 1895 he denounced in unmeasured terms every species of subsidy.

In 1900 the Commissioner of Navigation, in his annual report, prepared the facts and figures which were used in the preparation of the ship-subsidy bill debated during the last session of Congress, commonly called the Hanna-Payne bill, and which carried $9,000,000 per year for twenty years. This, the majority told us, was to equalize the difference between the cost of construction and operation of ships in the United States and foreign countries.

The minority of the committee resisted most bitterly and successfully these figures, and the bill went down in defeat. Now, in less than one year the majority tell us that one million per year will equalize this difference. In a period of one year the Commissioner and the majority of the committee have fallen from nine to one million. It brings to me no ordinary pleasure to know that the figures of the Commissioner of Navigation and the majority of the committee that were given in support of the bill of last session, through the efforts of the minority, have been proven to be incorrect.

The minority saved to the country eight millions per year for a period of twenty years when we defeated the bill before us during the last session of Congress. When the majority of the committee now come forward and admit that only one million per year is necessary to equalize this difference and prepare a bill accordingly this is an open admission that the bill which we had before us carrying nine millions per year was a fraud and outrage upon the Treasury of the United States.

If this bill could be postponed until another session of Congress, the Commissioner of Navigation and the majority of the committee would probably receive new light that would dispel all darkness, gloom, and uncertainty, and enable them to discover the real truth that American ships can be built and operated as cheaply in the United States as any country in the world. Our friend, the Commissioner of Navigation, can then return to his first love, and we will welcome him and denounce every species of subsidy as unjust, unnecessary, undemocratic, and against the spirit of our free institutions. I mean nothing unkind, only give these facts to show how good men can sometimes be mistaken.

I have already pointed out the fact that an American ship may hire its crew as easily in Liverpool as in New York; as easily in Hamburg as Philadelphia; as easily in Hongkong as San Francisco, if she plies between any of these ports. Shipping Commissioner Dickey, of New York, an ardent protectionist, says that the New York, St. Louis, and St. Paul hire most of their men in Southhampton. Investigation shows that the men who are employed on board the ships of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company are secured in Hongkong, and the great majority are Chinese. I read from The Arena, 1900, in an article written by Mr. John C. Watson and Richard Runke, of Wisconsin, and they ask the question, Should our marine be subsidized?

In answer to the question they show conclusively that the steamships of all nations in the Asiatic trade, on the deck and in the hold, employ Asiatics, and in this respect the American and his competitors are on a perfect equality. I quote from the editor of the Coast Seamen's Journal, which says:

> Wages are equal on the vessel of all nationalities with shipping crews in any given port. In other words, it is the rule of the port and not the flag of the ship that governs wages.

The difference between American and foreign rate of wages can be, and in fact is, overcome by the shipping crews in foreign ships for the round trip, As regards provision, coal, oil, etc., it can be demonstrated that American shipowners have positive and very considerable advantages over their competitors.

The junior Senator from Maine alluded to the Oceanic. One-half of the plates in the great Oceanic came from Pennsylvania. The higher efficiency of American labor is not disputed. Says the editor of the New York Journal of Commerce:

> Undoubtedly any difference in wages is more than made up in the value of labor. That the American builder can compete needs no proof to one conversant with facts.

Mr. Cramp said himself:

For the Russian war ships we are building we competed with Germany and France. We have also built ships for the Japanese Government, and our bids were lower by 20 per cent than those of Mr. Armstrong, the English builder.

I maintain that experience has shown in transportation by sea the demands of trade will call into being a means of communication as rapidly as a subsidy, and the means thus created will prove to be much healthier and more permanent than those based upon subsidy. Our shipping facilities with Asia enjoy special advantages over the lines of competitive nations. A subsidy to such lines is absolutely indefensible. It requires no argument to show that the position of the United States places European nations at a disadvantage in competing for the trade of Asia. Still the friends of this bill emphasize the subsidy and benefits to accrue to our Asiatic trade under the provisions of this bill.

I am sure that the city of Chicago is more than 3,000 miles nearer to Shanghai than Liverpool or Bremen. It is true that our Pacific ports are more than 5,000 miles nearer to Shanghai than either the British or German ports. How can England, Germany, and France compete with the United States in placing the products of either the farm or the factory on the shores of China when the distance through the Suez Canal to eastern Asia is greater by 5,000 miles than the distance across the Pacific from San Francisco to Shanghai?

I quote from an address issued from the Tariff Reform Club, of New York, in a reply to the argument of Mr. Chamberlain in favor of the subsidy bill which we had before us during the last session of Congress, in which statement we find a quotation issued by the Treasury Bureau of Statistics, showing that during the first nine months of the current fiscal year of 1900, in the trade between the United States, China, Japan, and other countries of the Orient, our imports have been $112,992,000, which is an increase of $32,000,000 over those of the corresponding months of the last fiscal year. To Japan alone our exports during the last nine months of the same year were $23,330,000, which was an increase of $11,400,000 over the exports to Japan during the corresponding months of the preceding year.

Well did the Reform Club ask the question, On what economic principle can ships engaged in this trade with Asia be subsidized? The Reform Club in the same article sets forth the fact that all the Pacific steamship lines now leaving ports in the United States are controlled by transcontinental railroads, and freight rates are fixed by these roads from the point of original shipment to Asia. New steamship lines from our Pacific ports could get no cargo, except such as these railroads bring them, and a new line would therefore be obliged to fix their freight rates as the railroads might dictate.

The Reform Club correctly reaches the conclusion that a subsidy under such circumstances would be a gift by the Government to the profits of these existing railroad and steamship companies. The Reform Club further points out the fact that these existing lines would have no incentive to reduce freight rates and every incentive to keep rates up, while new competitive steamship lines would be starved out by the railroads at will. I have never yet heard these contentions successfully disputed. I have thus far been discussing the details of the bill, but, from my standpoint, the bill is vicious in principle. I am willing to tax the people to pay the legitimate expenses of the Government, but when you undertake to aid any citizen's private business at the expense of the public Treasury, such legislation is unjust and is in favor of a particular class and against the masses.

Equal rights and equal opportunities to engage in any business or enterprise and to receive equal or corresponding benefits from public expenditures are among the fundamental principles embodied in the Constitution.

These are the words of ex-Senator Edmunds in a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce during the last session of Congress, which was so ably discussed by the Senator from Missouri. After quoting from ex-Senator Edmunds, who declared unequivocally that a bounty to any class or any interest or any one product violates the Constitution of the United States, the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] asked the question, which has never been answered:

If the shipbuilders and shipowners are entitled to bounty, why not give a bounty in the years of distress in the agricultural districts to the farmer and cattle raiser? Why not give a bounty to the miner? If we enter upon this broad domain of opening the Treasury and dispensing the tax money of the people at the discretion or will of Congress, where is the end and what is the limitation?

These questions, so aptly put by the distinguished Senator in the unanswerable speech delivered at the last session of Congress, have not been answered and, I apprehend, never will be. Legislation should always tend to equalize the conditions of human life, and not to build up a moneyed aristocracy.

We do not wish to produce in America great estates and an impoverished and helpless people. I deny the theory that we have arrived at a period in the history of our Republic that the whole people can be taxed for the benefit of the few. No political party is entitled to retain the confidence of the American people which adheres to a policy founded on favoritism or class legislation. If one class of men fail to successfully manage their business, have they the right to call upon the taxpayers to make up their losses? The money given to the shipowners is necessarily taken from the rest of our citizens. Can not the farmer with equal grace ask for a bounty on his corn, wheat, cotton, and other products?

Can not the carpenter, the blacksmith, the brick mason, and the shoemaker say you have helped the shipowners, why not help us? Why can not our railroads and street-car lines come to Congress and say: "Our business has been unsuccessful; you have helped the shipowners, now help us." No private industry in this country has any right to aid at the expense of the public Treasury. The political party to which I belong stands for absolute justice, equality of rights, economical and honest government, and equal opportunities for all men under and before the law. We oppose every species of legislation founded on favoritism—one class of citizens are entitled to as much consideration at the hands of the Government as another. We do not believe that the financial success of one class of our people is of greater concern than another.

The position of the majority is simply this: In order to establish one industry and make it more successful, every other business and employment must be compelled to contribute. There are hundreds and thousands of industries doing a losing business—farmers, merchants, and manufacturers. Should Congress for this reason go into the public Treasury and save them from bankruptcy? Many farmers in my State have been doing a losing business. This is doubtless true in every section of our country, but should Congress for this reason come to their aid, through an appropriation, at the expense of the whole people? Absolute equality of rights is a doctrine we should never abandon.

The shipowner, the artisan, the plowman, the sugar planter, the cotton grower, all stand equal before the law; one should be the recipient of no more favors than another; all should likewise bear the same burdens. On this side of the Chamber we will remain true to the principles of our Government; we will never desert principle, even to obtain victory. We shall always seek to rally around our standard the aspirations and hopes of all men who love equality of rights, liberty, and justice.

APPENDIX A.

ACT OF 1891.

CHAP. 519.—An act to provide for ocean mail service between th United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and empowered to enter into contracts for a term not less than five nor more than ten years in duration, with American citizens, for the carrying of mails on American steamships, between ports of the United States and such ports in foreign countries, the Dominion of Canada excepted, as in his judgment will best subserve and promote the postal and commercial interests of the United States, the mail service on such lines to be equitably distributed among the Atlantic, Mexican Gulf, and Pacific ports. Said contracts shall be made with the lowest responsible bidder for the performance of said service on each route, and the Postmaster-General shall have the right to reject all bids not in his opinion reasonable for the attaining of the purposes named.

SEC. 2. That before making any contract for carrying ocean mails in accordance with this act the Postmaster-General shall give public notice by advertising once a week, for three months, in such daily papers as he shall select in each of the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, St. Louis, Charleston, Norfolk, Savannah, Galveston, and Mobile, and when the proposed service is to be on the Pacific Ocean, then in San Francisco, Tacoma, and Portland. Such notice shall describe the route, the time when such contract will be made, the duration of the same, the size of the steamers to be used, the number of trips a year, the times of sailing, and the time when the service shall commence, which shall not be more than three years after the contract shall be let. The details of the mode of advertising and letting such contracts shall be conducted in the manner prescribed in chapter 8 of Title XLVI of the Revised Statutes for the letting of inland mail contracts so far as the same shall be applicable to the ocean mail service.

SEC. 3. That the vessels employed in the mail service under the provisions of this act shall be American-built steamships, owned and officered by American citizens, in conformity with the existing laws, or so owned and officered and registered according to law, and upon each departure from the United States the following proportion of the crew shall be citizens of the United States, to wit: During the first two years of such contract for carrying the mails, one-fourth thereof; during the next three succeeding years, one-third thereof; and during the remaining time of the continuance of such contract, at least one-half thereof; and shall be constructed after the latest and most approved types, with all the modern improvements and appliances for ocean steamers. They shall be divided into four classes. The first class shall be iron or steel screw steamships, capable of maintaining a speed of 20 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 8,000 tons. No vessel except of said first class shall be accepted for said mail service under the provisions of this act between the United States and Great Britain. The second class shall be iron or steel steamships, capable of maintaining a speed of 16 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 5,000 tons. The third class shall be iron or steel steamships, capable of maintaining a speed of 14 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 2,500 tons. The fourth class shall be iron or steel or wood steamships, capable of maintaining a speed of 12 knots an hour at sea in ordinary weather, and of a gross registered tonnage of not less than 1,500 tons. It shall be stipulated in the contract or contracts to be entered into for the said mail service that said vessels may carry passengers with their baggage in addition to said mails and may do all ordinary business done by steamships.

SEC. 4. That all steamships of the first, second, and third classes employed as above and hereafter built shall be constructed with particular reference to prompt and economical conversion into auxiliary naval cruisers, and according to plans and specifications to be agreed upon by and between the owners and the Secretary of the Navy, and they shall be of sufficient strength and stability to carry and sustain the working and operation of at least four effective rifled cannon of a caliber of not less than 6 inches, and shall be of the highest rating known to maritime commerce. And all vessels of said three classes heretofore built and so employed shall, before they are accepted for the mail service herein provided for, be thoroughly inspected by a competent naval officer or constructor detailed for that service by the Secretary of the Navy; and such officer shall report, in writing, to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall transmit said report to the Postmaster-General; and no such vessel not approved by the Secretary of the Navy as suitable for the service required shall be employed by the Postmaster-General as provided for in this act.

SEC. 5. That the rate of compensation to be paid for such ocean mail service of the said first-class ships shall not exceed the sum of $4 a mile, and for the second-class ships $2 a mile, by the shortest practicable route, for each outward voyage; for the third-class ships shall not exceed $1 a mile and for the fourth-class ships two-thirds of $1 a mile for the actual number of miles required by the Post-Office Department to be traveled on each outward-bound voyage: Provided, That in the case of failure from any cause to perform the regular voyages stipulated for in said contracts or any of them, a pro rata deduction shall be made from the compensation on account of such omitted voyage or voyages; and that suitable fines and penalties may be imposed for delays or irregularities in the due performance of service according to the contract, to be determined by the Postmaster-General: Provided further, That no steamship so employed and so paid for carrying the United States mails shall receive any other bounty or subsidy from the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 6. That upon each of said vessels the United States shall be entitled to have transported, free of charge, a mail messenger, whose duty it shall be to receive, sort, take in charge, and deliver the mails to and from the United States, and who shall be provided with suitable room for the accommodation of himself and the mails.

SEC. 7. That officers of the United States Navy may volunteer for service on said mail vessels, and when accepted by the contractor or contractors may be assigned to such duty by the Secretary of the Navy whenever in his opinion such assignment can be made without detriment to the service, and while in said employment they shall receive furlough pay from the Government, and such other compensation from the contractor or contractors as may be agreed upon by the parties: Provided, That they shall only be required to perform such duties as appertain to the merchant service.

SEC. 8. That said vessels shall take, as cadets or apprentices, one American-born boy under 21 years of age for each 1,000 tons gross register, and one for each majority fraction thereof, who shall be educated in the duties of seamanship, rank as petty officers, and receive such pay for their services as may be reasonable.

SEC. 9. That such steamers may be taken and used by the United States as transports or cruisers, upon payment to the owners of the fair actual value of the same at the time of the taking, and if there shall be a disagreement as to the fair actual value of the same at the time of the taking, and if there shall be a disagreement as to the fair actual value between the United States and the owners, then the same shall be determined by two impartial appraisers, one to be appointed by each of said parties, they at the same time selecting a third, who shall act in said appraisement in case the two shall fail to agree.

Approved, March 3, 1891.

APPENDIX B.

[From Report of Postmaster-General for 1901.]

TRANSATLANTIC MAILS.

As heretofore, the mails for Great Britain and the Continent of Europe have been dispatched by every fast steamer, and when two fast steamers sail on the same day or succeeding days the mails have been, as a rule, assigned to the one whose previous speed record gave reason to believe that it would deliver the mail sooner on the other side of the Atlantic. Other things being equal, preference has been given to steamers sailing under the flag of the United States, and especially to those under contract with this Department, at a compensation of $4 for each mile traveled from New York to Southampton.

Steamers flying the flag of the United States but not under contract are allowed for their services all the postage collected on the mails they carry from this country; that is to say, 5 cents a half ounce, $1.60 a pound (or $3,200 a short ton) for letters and post cards, and 1 cent for 2 ounces, 8 cents a pound (or $160 a short ton) for other articles. In the case of a steamer conveying the mails under a foreign flag, compensation for the service is allowed at the rate of 44 cents a pound (or $880 a short ton) for letters and post cards, and 4½ cents a pound (or $90 a short ton) for other articles, calculated on the actual net weight of the mails conveyed.

The transfer service in New York Harbor, whereby the fast mail steamers arriving from Europe are met at the quarantine station by a special mail steamer, which receives the mails and conveys them as rapidly as possible to the various railroad wharves, whence the mails for the city of New York are immediately sent to the post-office in that city and those for inland destinations are forwarded by the first outgoing trains, has been continued without accident or interruption.

CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICAN AND WEST INDIAN MAILS.

There have been no radical changes in the service to these countries during the year.

Our communication with the west coast of Central and South America has been regular and reliable once a week by means of steamers plying between New York and Colon; and to Venezuela we have a semimonthly service by means of the Red "D" Line, which is performing contract service between New York and La Guaira under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, the contract rate of pay being $1 a mile outward, and which dispatches two additional steamers a month that are not under contract with this Department.

At least two of these steamers each month call at San Juan or Ponce, P. R. Contract service at the same rate of pay is also performed once a week by the New York and Cuba Mail Steamship Company between New York and Habana and once a week between New York and certain Mexican Gulf ports via Habana. Besides, there is additional through service with Cuba by means of steamers plying three times a week between Tampa, Fla., and Habana, Cuba, and by means of steamers of the Munson Line sailing from New York twice a month for northern Cuban ports. This last service is performed under a domestic contract and does not come under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1891. With Porto Rico we have mail communication at least five times a month—twice by means of steamers of the Red "D" Line and three times by means of steamers of the New York and Porto Rico Line, the latter service being performed under a domestic mail contract. For the future, mails for Porto Rico will be dispatched weekly by means of a steamer sailing from New York every Saturday for San Juan.

With Jamaica we have contract ocean mail service by means of steamers of the American Mail Steamship Company, sailing twice a week from Boston or Philadelphia for Port Antonio, Jamaica. Besides, steamers of the Atlas Line sailed regularly twice a month from New York for Kingston, and there has been a sailing every week from Philadelphia or Baltimore for Port Antonia.

Communication with the other West Indian Islands has been maintained without material change, and principally by means of the New York and Cuba, Quebec, Atlas, Clyde, Royal Dutch West India, Trinidad, Bahamas, Strauss, Cameron, and Demerara lines of steamers.

With British Honduras (Belize), Guatemala, and the Republic of Honduras we have regular communication by means of steamers flying the flag of the United States, which sail every week from New Orleans. By steamers sailing from the same port we have regular weekly communication with Costa Rica, and frequently, although irregular, communication with Nicaragua, and with the Colombian ports of Bocas del Toro, Cartagena, and Santa Marta; and from Mobile, Ala., we have frequent, although irregular, service with Bocas del Toro (Colombia) and Belize.

By means of the Lamport & Holt, Sloman's Brazil, Norton, Knott's Prince, Red Cross, Booth, and Houston lines, mails for Brazil and the River Plata countries have been dispatched seven or eight times a month by steamers sailing for those countries direct. Mails for northern ports of Brazil were dispatched 48 times by steamers sailing from New York for Para, Manaos, Maranham, Ceara, Pernambuco, and Bahia. Mails for Brazil generally and for La Plata countries were dispatched 53 times by steamers sailing from New York for Rio de Janeiro or Santos, Brazil. Mails for La Plata countries were dispatched 53 times by steamers sailing from New York for Montevideo and Buenos Ayres. Correspondence for Brazil and the River Plata countries is not, however, held for dispatch by these steamers, but is forwarded via England when that course will expedite its delivery at destination.

TRANS-PACIFIC MAILS.

By means of steamers sailing four times a month from San Francisco and once or twice a month from Tacoma or Seattle, mails for Japan and China have been dispatched not less than six times a month.

These mails have included articles for the Philippines; but mails for the Philippines have also been dispatched by naval vessels and by steamers chartered for military purposes which sailed from San Francisco for Manila in the intervals between the sailings of the regular mail steamers during the year. Correspondence for Japan and China has also been forwarded to Vancouver, British Columbia, for dispatch per steamers leaving that port every four weeks, when the delivery of the correspondence would be thereby expedited.

By reason of the contract with the Oceanic Steamship Company, mentioned under the heading "Contract Ocean Mail Service," mails for the Australasian Colonies have been dispatched from San Francisco, commencing in November, 1900, once every three weeks instead of once every four weeks as previously, the transit time from San Francisco to Sydney being reduced from twenty-five to twenty-one days, and mails being delivered en route at Pago Pago.

Advantage is also taken of the opportunities offered for the dispatch of correspondence for the colonies by means of the Canadian line of steamers sailing from Vancouver, British Columbia, every four weeks.

The steamers above referred to call at Honolulu, and the Oceanic Steamship Company dispatches an additional vessel every month to that port. Besides, most of the steamers en route for Japan and China usually call at Honolulu, so that there are not less than seven opportunities a month for communication by mail with Hawaii, and generally there are not less than eight, in addition to occasional dispatches by means of naval vessels and Army transports.

Mails for Japan, China, and the Australasian colonies are forwarded from San Francisco to Honolulu, to be transferred there to steamers sailing from Vancouver and calling at Honolulu en route to those countries; and mails for the United States arriving at Honolulu by steamers bound for Vancouver are transferred to steamers sailing from Honolulu to San Francisco. By such transfers the delivery of the mails so transferred is expedited by three or four days.

APPENDIX C.

THE PROSPECTIVE EXPANSION IN AMERICAN SHIPBUILDING.

[By G. R. Dunnell.]

The British shipbuilder who keeps an intelligent eye on industrial progress abroad sees nothing much plainer just now than that he will be, probably before very long, face to face with serious competition from the United States. The prospect is not a pleasant one, and therefore he will avoid facing it as long as possible. But it is inevitable in the nature of things, for there are natural laws which govern economics just as there are natural laws of another kind which direct physical phenomena. The great rivers flow in dependence on these natural laws. Man may meddle a little here and there, erecting a dam or straightening a channel, imposing a tax or granting a bounty, but the rivers keep to their valleys, and the streams of commerce roll just where the natural conditions are most favorable, in spite of petty obstructions such as legislative enactment or protective tariff and fostering bounties.

For shipbuilding and marine engineering (which is a part of shipbuilding largely considered) natural conditions are becoming exceedingly favorable in the United States. We find there, first of all, a race ingenious, resolute, ambitious; a people who have been, by the working of nature's two great laws—survival and heredity—fitted to grapple with large problems and win success in the face of difficulty. That is the first requisite, without which the rest is of no avail. Nature has also given this nation a long coast line, harbors, and those mineral riches which are now the raw material of the shipbuilder. These conditions being present, the Americans, in becoming shipbuilders, are but working out their natural destiny.

The Americans have once already shown themselves well fitted for maintaining a ship-producing industry. This was in the days when mechanical propulsion was in its infancy—when steam engines were not a very serious factor in the ocean freight trade of the world. But who doubts the mechanical genius of the Americans? By their boldness and originality in engineering conceptions so much the more are they now fitted for the work of sea carriage in these days of universal steam propulsion. When Americans formerly held a high position as a shipbuilding country, she had raw material in abundance, her forests affording a plentiful supply of timber. Her well-designed ships then furnished models which the British were fain to copy; and the fearless manner in which the shipowning firms managed their business subjected British enterprise to a test such as it had not before been put to, and has never experienced since.

Artificial restraints—those dams to which I have already made reference—did something to destroy or, perhaps, rather check the career of the shipbuilding industry in America, but natural causes have contributed immeasurably more to this end. When iron, and later mild steel, became the materials for ship construction, it was not in the nature of things that America should produce them, for the natural laws of the industrial development are not to be unduly hurried any more than those governing physical phenomena, and the country was not then ripe for iron making on a big scale. The energies of the people, great as they were, had been engaged in other directions. The vast mineral riches of the continent were unknown, or if known were not in a position to be utilized. No one can doubt, however, in spite of the depredations of the Alabama, that had the United States possessed an iron-making industry equal to that of England after the close of the civil war the national qualities which enabled the country to compete so successfully in the days of wind-driven wooden hulls would have kept her flag floating beside the red ensign in the ports of the world.

These things are worth considering by the British shipbuilder and the British shipowner just now, for, if they look across the Atlantic they find that this great bar to the establishment of a modern American shipbuilding industry, the lack of raw material, has recently been removed. In 1890 the president of the Iron and Steel Institute, Sir James Kitson, addressing an American congress, said: "The supremacy of our (British) shipbuilders and our shipping interest is based upon the excellent quality and the abundant supply at moderate prices of steel furnished by our steel makers." Now, the United States produces more pig iron—the primary raw material of steel, and therefore of ships—than any other country in the world, not excluding the United Kingdom. This matter lies at the root of our subject.

Pig iron, as has been said, is the chief raw material of the shipbuilder; that and timber, of which there is plenty in America, a little copper of which there are also excellent native supplies, paint, varnish, and some other accessories, are all that are needed for ship construction and marine engine building. Iron, however, is the dominant factor, the term, of course, including that description of iron known as mild steel, but more properly called ingot iron. Going back thirty years, we find that the production of pig iron in the United States was 1,431,250 tons in 1868, while during the same year Great Britain produced 4,970,206 tons. In 1897 the total production of pig iron in the United States had increased to 9,652,680 tons, while for the same year in the United Kingdom the total was 8,798,455 tons. Thus we see that, while Great Britain was roughly 3,500,000 tons ahead of America thirty years ago, twenty-nine years later she was not very far from 1,000,000 tons behind. It was in 1890, the year of Sir James Kitson's address, that America first forged ahead, and, except in 1894, she has kept the lead ever since.

It is not all pig iron, however, that is suitable for shipbuilding purposes. But this remark would have possessed greater weight ten or twelve years ago, and is likely to possess less in the future than it has at present. This is to say, the spread of the basic process of steel making appears likely to bring us nearer, so far as the utilization of native products is concerned, to the conditions which were present when iron and not steel was used for shipbuilding; for we can now use in basic-lined furnaces those phosphoric or non-bessemer ores which are not admissible with the acid process. When ships were made of wrought iron, as they were for many years after the first year we have dealt with, any country producing a fair iron ore was able to convert it into good ship plates, angles, etc. In those days England claimed that her engineering and shipbuilding trade held an almost impregnable position because iron, stone, coal, and limestone were in close juxtaposition, and that, too, near the sea. Though other countries possessed these minerals, they were more or less widely distributed, generally inland. Freight had to be paid on one or more of them, thus bringing up the cost of production. In those days, too, the notion that there was something native to the "right little, tight little island" which would always enable Britons to defy the world in such matters had not received the unpleasant jars which it has since experienced.

However this may be, the facts as to geographical distribution, or, rather, concentration, of materials were true, and the arguments founded on them were sound at the time. Since then what a change we have seen! The very practice in engineering which Englishmen initiated has wrought such wonders in annihilating distance that coal, iron ore, and limestone, though long distances apart and hundreds of miles from the seaboard geographically, commercially may be close together and within easy reach of a port of shipment. On the American continent this has been due chiefly to the wonderful development of the railway—a matter we shall refer to again later—while on the ocean the work has been almost wholly British.

Another step, besides easy freight, was needed to shake the comfortable British supremacy founded on iron, coal, and limestone in narrow compass; and this step was brought about also by an Englishman, who thereby put the ironstone of his native country out of the market so far as shipbuilding was concerned. When Henry Bessemer was struggling to introduce his great invention with courage as true and a will as firm as his own steel—fighting the world of science and industry to establish his process—he was an unconscious servant of destiny, initiating a change destined to alter the whole aspect of a great industry, and to cause a shipping of the basis of iron making that now, after many years, gives an opportunity to the rivals of his native country. British ores, for the most part comparatively rich in phosphorus, were nevertheless suitable for the production of wrought iron, but were quite unfitted for the manufacture of mild steel by the acid process—the only process known until long after. Great Britain had only a few deposits of non-phosphoric or bessemer ores, and thus it came about, so far from getting ore, coal, and limestone from one district (it is said that occasionally all three have come out of the same pit), she has, during many years past, been sending hundreds of miles across the ocean for nearly all the iron ore that is smelted and worked up for ship construction.

If we turn again to statistics of the British iron trade for the year 1897, we find that of the 8,789,455 tons of pig iron produced in Great Britain 2,601,806 tons were devoted to the production of open-hearth steel ingots. In the United States, during the same period, the production of open-hearth ingots amounted to 1,631,843 tons. Now, it is hardly necessary to say that open-hearth steel is that description from which ships are built. It must not be confounded with bessemer steel, which is the product of the converter; but it was Bessemer's invention which led to the introduction of the open-hearth process, which we owe chiefly to a Frenchman, Martin, who adapted Siemen's furnace to steel-making purposes. Though the American output of the open-hearth steel falls considerably short of the British, it is amply sufficient to prove that the production can be increased when the demand arises. Indeed, it is increasing year by year in a very substantial manner. If confirmation of the ability of America to supply raw material for shipbuilding be needed, witness the fact that American steel makers have been rolling ship plates for the British market.

There are, it is true, special reasons for the import of such material into England—or rather, Ireland—just now, reasons which may prove of a transitory nature. This, however, it is fair to say, is not the opinion of some Americans connected with the steel trade, who are sanguine that they will secure a substantial share of the business in England; and certainly the experiment is not being looked on with indifference by British steel makers. The bringing of steel plates, angles, etc., across the Atlantic appears, however, too much like directing the stream of commerce into artificial channels ever to gain permanence. In any case, if Great Britain should have to rely to any extent on a foreign source of supply, there would be a poor prospect for her in the building of ships. Such an eventuality is not, however, what we have now to consider, the question being rather whether America can supply herself with manufacturing steel for shipbuilding on terms equal to those existing in Great Britain.

Turning again to our table of statistics, we find the production of open-hearth steel divided into two classes, acid and basic. As is well known, the basic process was an English invention, but has found more favor in foreign countries, notably Germany, than in the land of its birth. Of the 2,601,806 tons open-hearth ingots produced in Great Britain in 1897, not less than 2,393,718 tons were made with the acid process from nonphosphoric ores, mostly imported, thus leaving only 208,808 tons to the basic process. In the United States, on the other hand, during the same year, out of the total 1,631,843 tons of open-hearth ingots, 1,075,689 tons were of basic steel and only 556,156 tons were of acid steel. It may be added that during 1897 Germany produced 1,304,423 tons (metric) of basic open-hearth steel. This was made largely from native ores very similar to the large British deposits, though a good deal of highly phosphoric ore, rich in iron, is imported.

In the early part of this year an English engineer, well acquainted with American metallurgical practice, Mr. Archibald P. Head, of 47 Victoria street, Westminster, read an extremely interesting paper on "The American Iron and Steel Industry." In this valuable contribution the author not only showed to what a remarkable extent the Americans were forging ahead in the iron-making industry, but also gave detail of the way in which they gained their end. Many of the advantages they possess are the result of physical conditions, but not a few are due to natural characteristics, enterprise, and that rare intelligence which makes scientific discovery minister to commercial success through the channel of wise and liberal expenditure.

The net result of all these conditions is that not only pig iron but manufactured iron and steel can be produced more cheaply in the United States than in Great Britain, and that to an extent of which few not connected with the industry have any idea. Thus, to quote Mr. Head's figures, Bessemer ore could be sold in Pittsburg at 11s. 6d. per ton, while the price in Middlesborough was 14s. 9d. This, however, is not all, for the American ore has 63 per cent of iron in it, while the Spanish ore used at Middlesborough has, say, 50 per cent. Here there is an advantage for the American steel maker at the start, for he has his ore brought to the coal and limestone at 3s. 3d. less per ton than the price at which the Englishman gets his. In both cases long distances have been traversed, but the American has the great disadvantage of land carrying. But the American railway engineer has made so good use of his opportunities that the railway rate for minerals is less than half that in Great Britain, and often very greatly below that figure. Of course Bilbao ore has practically no railway carrying in transport to Middlesborough, while the ore for the Pittsburg furnaces is taken some distance by train. If the American freight trains were run upon the English goods system the 11s. 6d. paid for iron ore in Pittsburg would be considerably increased.

Continuing Mr. Head's figures, we find American coke 6s. 6d. per ton as against 13s. 6d. for Durham coke, and, although the United States fuel has not the appearance which a Durham maker considers indispensable, it gives good results, being hard and bearing the burden in the blast furnace very well. Coal is notoriously cheap in Pittsburg. Mr. Head gives steam coal at 3s. per ton, which is much below the prices that rule in England. As a result of these and other conditions bessemer pig is produced in America at 40s. per ton as against 50s. per ton for Middlesborough pig. Nonbessemer pig is given as 38s. 9d. for Pittsburg and 40s. 9d. for Middlesborough. Having read these figures, we are not surprised to find the price of steel ship plates to be £4 12s. at Pittsburg as against £5 10s. at Middlesborough, though, in considering these quotations, it must not be forgotten that ships can be built at Middlesborough, while the Pittsburg plates would have a long journey to make to the ocean ports. For boiler plates the prices given are £5 18s. 6d. in America and £6 10s. in England.

APPENDIX D.

NAVY AND MERCHANT MARINE—A YEAR'S DEVELOPMENTS IN AMERICA—LARGER ORDERS FOR NEW SHIPS OF WAR THAN AT ANY OTHER TIME IN THE HISTORY OF THE COUNTRY—PROSPEROUS CONDITION OF THE SHIPBUILDING INDUSTRY AS REGARDS ITS RELATIONS TO THE COASTING TRADE—A FEW LARGE SHIPS FOR OVER-SEA COMMERCE.

Reviewing again a year's developments in the shipbuilding industry of the United States, it may be said that without probably a single exception the yards that engage in building steel vessels have work ahead to their full capacity for at least twelve months, and some of them for a much greater length of time. This is true of all shipyards of the seaboard, as well as those of the Great Lakes.

On the seaboard the great bulk of work is, of course, in the construction of ships of war, but the demand for new vessels for coasting service, the feature of most prominence in American shipbuilding during the past two or three years, still continues, and notwithstanding the failure thus far of all efforts to secure Government aid for foreign-trade shipping, the coming year will see the completion of a few vessels for oversea commerce that will be among the finest in the world. These latter include 2 Pacific mail liners nearing completion at the Newport News works, 6 large freighters for the Atlantic Transport Line at Camden, N. J., and at Sparrows Point, Md., and 2 steamers at New London, Conn., for service on the Pacific in connection with the Great Northern Railway that will be of about the same dimensions as the White Star liner Celtic, the largest ship afloat.

In naval circles the year is distinguished by the fact that the most magnificent order for new vessels of war ever awarded by the Government was given to the shipbuilders. Contracts were awarded for 14 warships—5 battleships, 6 armored cruisers, and 3 protected cruisers—aggregating 187,354 tons in displacement, 297,120 in horsepower, and costing, exclusive of armor and armament, $49,944,600. There is no single instance which equals this splendid total. Altogether 61 warships are now building for the United States Navy, representing a total displacement of 289,183 tons, 567,620 horsepower, and costing, for hulls and machinery only, $80,954,116. In addition, the last naval act authorized the construction of 2 battleships and 2 armored cruisers. The plans for these will be submitted to Congress at its next session by the naval board of construction.

If there is any tendency to be noted in naval construction it is to further eliminate the line of demarcation between the battle ship and armored cruiser. A battle ship was originally a vessel with tremendous powers, offense and defense, and limited seagoing qualities; a cruiser was originally a vessel of limited powers, offense and defense, but of great speed and steaming radius. The tendency is to increase the cruising area of the battle ship with sacrifice in the weight of armor or force of armament, and, on the other hand, to give to the cruiser a terrific battery and heavy belt of armor, with reduction in steaming radius. Thus the line between the two types is gradually vanishing. This form of warship, treating the two types as one, is very popular in the United States and Great Britain, as will be noted from a review of their programmes.

The protected cruiser, or commerce detroyer, of which the Chateaurenault of the French navy and the Variag of the Russian navy are the highest types, are not popular in the United States or Great Britain. The American Navy's contribution to this type consists of the Columbia and Minneapolis, but no more are building. As they have slight powers of offense and defense their chief security lies in their great speed. Speed must ever be regarded as an unknown quantity, since it is only under the most perfect of conditions that the vessel can attain its maximum. The least derangement of the machinery would materially reduce the speed of the vessel. It is quite conceivable that an armored cruiser of 19 knots could overtake a commerce destroyer, and the issue, of course, could not then be in doubt.

The question of the superposed turret is still unsettled. The Kearsarge and Kentucky are equipped with this form of turret and several trials have proved them to be structurally practical. The naval board of construction, after heated arguments, decided to equip three of the five battle ships, for which contracts were lately let, with them; but it is clear that the board is not sure of the eventual utility of these turrets, for it has decided not to equip the two battle ships, for which plans are now being prepared, with them. The real point, indeed, is not the structural success of the turret, but iits vulnerability in actual conflict. If a chance shot would put the turret out of action, it would leave the ship without a battery, even though the guns in the turret were uninjured.

As previously noted, a healthful growth is still shown in the seabord coastwise trade. The present generation of shipbuilders have never enjoyed a season of such activity. To equal it one must go back to the clipper days of 1854 and 1855, before iron began to supplant wood in the construction of vessels, and when the American shipyards, thanks to the plentitude of constructive material, were great hives of industry. When iron was found to be more serviceable than wood the shipbuilding industry in the United States lagged because iron was scarce. The advance of the United States in recent years, however, as a steel-making nation, has through force of circumstances revived shipbuilding. The coast shipyards are crowded with passenger and freight steamers, building for the coastwise trade.

A considerable business is also being done in steel sailing vessels. Hitherto wood has had a practical monopoly of this class of construction. The sailing ship is not the rarity that it is supposed to be. It is only within the past year or two that steam tonnage has exceeded sailing tonnage in the United States. The proportion, however, is safely in favor of steam, owing to the fact that the sailing vessel has almost entirely disappeared from the Great Lakes. The novelty in sailing-ship construction has been the building of two six-masted schooners, the first vessels of this kind to be built anywhere in the world. The number of vessels built during the year ended June 30, 1901, was 1,173 of 401,285 gross tons, compared with 1,058 of 305,677 gross tons for the previous fiscal year. The distribution was as follows: Atlantic and Gulf coasts, 735 vessels of 190,948 tons; Great Lakes, 105 of 153,138 gross tons; Pacific coast, 151 of 46,105 gross tons, and Western rivers, 182 of 11,094 gross tons. (Blue Book of American Shipping, 1901.)

APPENDIX E.

COMMANDING THE WORLD'S ATTENTION.

* * * * * * *

The development in iron and steel shipbuilding, which was noted in the last issue of the Blue Book, continues with unabated energy. New shipyards are springing up along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. The New York Ship Building Company is building a new plant at Camden, N. J., which will be one of the largest in the country. Work is being rushed and the company expects to bid for the new battle ships and cruisers to be built by the United States Navy. Ship construction will be begun there sometime during the present year. At New London, Conn., the Eastern Ship Building Company is erecting an immense plant. The works of this company are primarily established to build two cargo carriers for the Pacific trade for James J. Hill, of the Great Northern Railway. These carriers will be of 34,000 tons and will exceed in size anything afloat.

Something of their size may be appreciated when it is said that they will be bigger than the Lucania and Campania put together and will have about 5 acres of deck space. As profit earning capacity and not speed is the end sought, they will be slow boats, designed for moderate coal consumption. The Wm. R. Trigg Company, of Richmond, Va., is adding extensively to its plant, being now engaged in an outlay of $800,000 in improvements. The new equipment will make it one of the largest shipbuilding plants on the Atlantic coast. The Fore River Engine Company, of Weymouth, Mass., one of the latest in the field, has grown so rapidly that it has just purchased 60 acres of land at Quincy Point, Mass., 2 miles from its present site, for a new plant.

The Cramps, at Philadelphia, have extended their works by the purchase of an adjoining shipyard, and the Newport News Company, at Newport News, Va., is just completing a very large dry dock and other additions to its plant. A healthful sign is the appearance of the American "tramp" steamer, which, nomad though it be, is the sure forerunner of a reviving merchant marine. The New England shipyards, too, are still building a type of very large sailing vessels, one of them a six-masted schooner, the largest that has ever been constructed. In the handling of that class of freight which depends more upon economy of movement than promptness of delivery, these vessels will have a distinct field of usefulness.

Since the opening of Alaska the Pacific coast has received a decided impetus in shipbuilding. The Risdon Iron Works, of San Francisco, has engaged in general shipbuilding. They are equipping a plant of sufficient capacity to build the largest type of ships. The Wolff & Zwicker Iron Works, of Portland, Oreg., is contemplating the erection of a shipbuilding plant at St. Johns. At the Union Iron Works, San Francisco, additions and improvements of considerable importance have been made of late, and the same is true in a proportionate degree of the smaller works. The development of trade with the Orient will make the Pacific coast an important center in shipbuilding. Of that there are sufficient signs already.

The approximate value of vessels built in shipyards of the Great Lakes during the past year is $10,500,000. Nearly all of these vessels are steel freight steamers of 450 to 500 feet in length and of 7,000 to 8,000 net tons capacity, equipped with quadruple-expansion engines of 1,800 to 3,000 horsepower, and in most cases with water-tube boilers. The year has, of course, been one of the most prosperous in the history of lake shipbuilding, on account of the boom in iron and steel lines. There are still a large number of ships under construction in the lake yards, some of them not to come out until the spring of 1901, and there is every reason to expect, in view of the profits assured to shipowners by reason of contracts made last fall, a renewal of orders that will give the yards nearly as much work for another winter as they have had in the past year.

If the number of new ships ordered for lake trade should be limited, the difference will probably be made up in steel freight steamers of about 3,000 tons capacity to be built for both lake and Atlantic service—vessels suited to passage through the Canadian canals from the lake to the seaboard. The canal type of steamer is about 255 feet over all, 42 feet beam, and 26 feet molded depth. About a dozen such vessels are now in commission on the lakes, and they might be sent on to the seaboard for coast service at any time. The few that have gone to the Atlantic have proven so successful in the trade to Porto Rico and down the United States coast that it is proposed to equip four others, now under construction at the works of the American Ship Building Company, for all kinds of service on salt water as well as on the lakes. Companies are forming for the construction and operation of a very large fleet of steamers of this kind, and it is expected that the lake builders will profit largely on this score. (Blue Book of American Shipping, 1900.)

Mr. HANNA. Mr. President, I would think it unnecessary to prolong the discussion on the pending bill if I felt that every member of this body would take the trouble to read the report which came from the Committee on Commerce accompanying the measure. I hold that that report is a complete analysis and a complete argument in favor of all that is claimed for the bill. But I propose simply to emphasize a few of the points upon which some changes have been made by the committee, and to answer some of the arguments offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY].

The Senator from Georgia quotes the chairman of the Committee on Commerce as having stated that all there is in this question which requires legislation is embraced in the one question of labor. I stand by that proposition in support of the chairman of the committee. The whole question is one of labor.

But I go further than the distinguished chairman in what I term raw material in the construction of a ship. I do not call raw material the plates and the angles and the beams which are placed in the yard for the construction of the ship. I go back to the ore in the ground—the pig iron from which all the material is manufactured—and I call it worth, if you please, 25 cents a ton where it lies, having been deposited by nature. That is all there is of raw material in the construction of a steel ship, because the moment the ore is touched by the hand of man it is labor, and every process of its development from the time it leaves the ground until it arrives at the place of construction for the ship is labor and nothing else. Through all the ramifications of its manufacture, from the ore to the pig iron and from the pig iron to the billet and from the billet to the plate and the shapes which go into the construction of a ship, it is labor, as are all the component parts that help to make the steel pure, and the necessary fluxes used in the manufacture of steel. They are all labor.

In short, Mr. President, 95 per cent of the cost of a ship in an American shipyard or in a shipyard in any other country is purely labor. Now, I am willing to carry that proposition further in this discussion and admit that although labor is higher in price in this country, it is more efficient; that a man with the aid of the improved machinery of to-day can complete more than he could ten or twenty years ago, and that he can complete more in this country than in any other with which I am familiar. Therefore, when it is claimed that the cost of the construction of a ship in the United States is 25 per cent more than its cost in a foreign country—in England, or Germany, or France—that simply measures the difference in the cost of wages.

When we go a step further and discuss the question of the cost of the operation of a ship, the same thing is true. Labor is the factor. And although the Senator from Georgia has given some figures to show that labor of some kinds on American ships is as cheap as in any other country, still when we come to study the facts and take the results of the entire cost of labor upon American ships, compared with ships of competing nations, we find that the percentage against us runs from 25 to 30. Therefore, in the final analysis of this question, I am perfectly willing to leave it upon that proposition—the cost of construction and the cost of maintenance and operation.

I remember in several recent discussions in this body to have heard a protest from the other side of the Chamber that the Republican representatives here were giving too much importance to the commercial side of questions; that they were measuring great questions by dollars and cents. And yet all there is in the argument of the Senator from Georgia is that this measure will cost us more than it ought to, forgetting and putting to one side the question of national importance and national prestige, while glorying in the fact that our country has but recently leaped to the front and is to-day a world power. He places his opposition entirely upon the ground that we will pay more than value received for the carrying of United States mails, and that we will pay more money than it is worth to the people of this country to build up an industry heretofore neglected.

The Senator said in his argument yesterday that he was proud of the development of the industries of the United States; that he gloried in the fact that our export trade was increasing at a rate which was a surprise to every other nation; that he gloried in the fact that, viewed either from the cost of production or from the value of those products, we were outstripping our competitors in the markets of the world. He admitted that the industries of this country had prospered way beyond those of any other, and was gratified to see those conditions, not only as natural results, but as due to whatever other agencies brought them about, which, Mr. President, is nothing more than the Republican policy of protection. I join with him in that spirit and admire him for the sentiment.

But he asks a very pertinent question—whether any other industry in the United States enjoys so much as we propose to give to the shipbuilding industry, the shipowning interest? My reply to that is yes; that a duty of $2 a thousand feet on lumber, which protects Georgia pine, is a good deal more protection. Any feature of the protective tariff which has contributed to the growth and development of this country has done for our industries just what we are asking Congress to do for this one neglected industry; and as the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] said the other day, it is the only industry in the United States which has not received the fostering care of this Government along the lines of protection, looking not only to the development of the industry itself, but as a necessary and important auxiliary to this great nation from every standpoint of its position as a nation.

A nation having taken a position as has ours as a world power, proceeding as we are in the construction of a Navy intended to be second to that of no other power in the world, will anybody deny the importance—aye, the absolute necessity—of having an auxiliary for that Navy in the shape of a merchant marine, constructed under the specifications and by direction of the Navy Department, and in time of war absolutely in the hands and under the control of the President, to use it in the most effective manner?

Experience is the best teacher I know of, and an object lesson is the best way to demonstrate a necessity. Are we to fail to profit by the experience of the older countries of the world, which for one hundred years and more, in the light of their experience and necessities, have adopted a certain policy with respect to maritime matters? Even at this late day Germany appreciates the importance of this question, and by spasmodic effort she is trying to catch up. She is engaged in the construction of so many vessels that even at the rate at which the United States are building ships she will soon outstrip us in her merchant marine; and every ship that is constructed under the laws of those countries for the purposes indicated is meant to be a ship of war when a ship of war is needed.

When the necessity arises, as it did in the Spanish war, where will the United States be? In that emergency for the transportation of troops and munitions of war almost everything that floated in the Atlantic waters was pressed into service. At that period the people of the Atlantic coast were trembling at the thought that possibly there would be an invasion from Spain by her terrible vessels, and every man who had an interest in any direction upon the coast was petitioning Congress for the protection of the seacoast. We had four steamers of the American Line, which, under the conditions of the law passed by Congress, were in a position to be called into service by the Secretary of the Navy. Responding to that call, every man, from the captain down to the fireman, enlisted in the service. When those four steamers were put upon the picket line all fears subsided.

Now, Mr. President, with that lesson to remember, and with a full realization that in future events and conditions we may be brought face to face with a more serious complication of arms, when it will be more important for us to have a Navy and an auxiliary, and when we find that the policy and the opportunity offer and that the people of this country are in favor of it, if this measure should be passed by and neglected by Congress, who would be to blame? "In time of peace prepare for war." We are doing that. We are building a splendid Navy, and the Congress stands ready at every session to vote millions of dollars for its construction; but I say it is just as important as a national question and as an economic policy to carry with that expenditure measures for an auxiliary navy and a merchant marine.

During the war still in existence between England and South Africa—the Boer war, so called—we saw England, in the exercise of her rights and privileges, call upon all the great English steamers composing the trans-Atlantic lines to the extent of her necessities for the transportation of her troops and munitions to South Africa, and they were bound to respond. When that great fleet was taken from the legitimate channels of trade, what was the result? Ocean rates advanced; they doubled and quadrupled. What would be the condition in this country if the opponents in that contest had been England and Germany or France or any other maritime power, both calling into service the auxiliary ships under their command and both fleets responding, as they must do? What would become of the commerce of the United States, seeking foreign markets through the only channels possible now, in foreign ships under foreign flags?

If two of the great maritime nations were engaged in war, so as to make it impossible for their ships to carry contraband of war, the products of the American farm and the American shop would stand in the storehouse until they rotted, if the war lasted long enough, and with the production of the farm and factory thrown back upon us like the dammed waters of Niagara, what would be the result? Everyone knows full well that it would bring stagnation to our industries and poverty to our producers.

No, Mr. President, there is something more in the transportation question than merely carrying letter bags. There is more in this proposition than dollars and cents to the United States, and the time has never occurred until now when the American people were placed in a position fully to realize and understand the other side and the other part of the great transportation question. I should like to hear it discussed above party questions in this instance, because we all feel alike a pride in our country and our country's advancement and development, and whatever is for our best interests and for the safety and perpetuity of our institutions is best for all of us. Therefore why draw party lines upon an economic measure, which the Senator from Georgia admits is satisfactory to him if it did not cost so much?

The value of a postal service on the ocean is dependent upon its regularity and its expedition. The people of this country have grown to want things done quickly and regularly. The business man is just as much disappointed and angered if he does not get his morning paper before breakfast as if he went without breakfast. Of the two, I think, he would rather go without his breakfast. The people want their business dispatched with speed. It is not a question of cost for postage. That is exemplified when in this country we use the telegraph at a higher rate than the mail and the telephone at a higher cost than either. What the Americans are striving for all the time is results and to get those results satisfactorily and as quickly as possible. What the American people are demanding to-day upon this great transportation question is that we shall have results which shall place us alongside, if not in advance, of any other nation in the world.

The Senator from Georgia says we are equal to it because of our wonderful mineral deposits and our wonderful industrial development. That is true. But the same efforts must be made to advance the shipping interest that were made to bring about our industrial development. Capital must be found to engage in it, and how do you propose to induce capital to invest in shipping when it can be demonstrated in advance that the capitalists will lose their money?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HANNA. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator give us some information, if he possesses it, in regard to the reports in the papers, I think they were last year, that Mr. Morgan's syndicate had bought two or three European lines of steamers? Is it or is it not true?

Mr. HANNA. You must ask somebody who knows. I know nothing about it.

Mr. TILLMAN. It was merely reported, and I thought the Senator, being in touch with that class of capital——

Mr. HANNA. Why does the Senator say I am in touch with it?

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is a man engaged in shipping, is he not?

Mr. HANNA. Yes; on the Great Lakes. That answer does not go as far as my question. Why does the Senator assume that I know what Mr. Morgan has done?

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, I thought the Senator and Mr. Morgan were friends; business friends, at least.

Mr. HANNA. I will answer the Senator's question. I know nothing about the purchase of the Leyland Line by J. P. Morgan & Co. any more than the Senator does from what has been published in the papers. But suppose he has purchased the control of the Leyland Line of foreign ships; they remain as they always have, under the British flag. That is simply the investment of American capital in foreign ships, and under the provisions of this bill not a single one of those ships can ever come under American registry or the American flag.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, does it not show that we have so much capital seeking investment that some of it has gone in that direction, and therefore his claim that we need to subsidize or protect American vessels does not hold good?

Mr. HANNA. The Senator's statement helps me along in my argument. It is an evidence that we have plenty of capital seeking investment, but capital seeks investment from which it can get returns, and it can be easily proved that under the British flag and under the conditions resulting from the British policy investment in shipping has been a very great advantage to the investor. It is because the ship costs 25 per cent less to build than ours and because it costs 25 to 30 per cent less to operate than ours, and for that reason the net result of construction and operation is 25 to 30 per cent in favor of the English ship.

Mr. TILLMAN. If that be true, why does not the German Emperor go to England to get his yacht built instead of going to Philadelphia?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Because he wanted the best yacht built.

Mr. HANNA. There are some questions I can answer more easily than that. I think the German Prince is glad the Kaiser did not do it, and that he sent him to America. He has had a pretty good time. He has enjoyed himself.

Mr. TILLMAN. One would suppose that the Emperor would have preferred to go to the kingdom of his late grandmother to patronize a shipyard rather than to come over here.

Mr. HANNA. If the Senator from South Carolina will allow me, perhaps he has not heard or does not know that for the last ten years the prestige and success of America in the yachting line have been preeminent. [Applause in the galleries.] Naturally the German Emperor would go where he can get the best yacht and the fastest one, and therefore he came to the United States. But I have not got down to yachts yet. I should like to talk about ships.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow just a parting inquiry?

Mr. HANNA. Yes; a parting one.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is this yacht for the German Emperor to be a steel yacht propelled by steam, or is it a mere sailing craft for racing purposes?

Mr. HANNA. I must admit that I do not know.

Mr. TILLMAN. I had supposed it is one of those steam yachts.

Mr. DEPEW. I will answer the Senator. I saw it launched. It is a sailing racing machine of the same character as the one that beat the two Shamrocks.

Mr. HANNA. Except she is a schooner instead of a sloop?

Mr. DEPEW. Yes.

Mr. HANNA. My conclusion, after considering this whole question from an economic standpoint, as far as my personal investigation has gone and as far as I have been able to obtain information, is that this measure is purely an attempt to equalize conditions. All that we of the United States want in this contest for the transportation of the world's goods is a fair show and an equal chance, and I might answer the whole argument made by the Senator from Georgia by repeating the question of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BURTON] yesterday: "If what you say is true, why have we not the ships?" Why have we not? Why does not capital seek that sort of investment if we can build and operate ships as cheaply in this country as our competitors can? The answer to it is that we can not, and the result of it is we have not the ships.

No man in the United States is so well qualified to speak upon this question from experience and knowledge as is the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and he has never submitted a proposition to the Congress of the United States that was not founded upon the best economic and business principles and in the interest of the development of this country. He has not studied this situation with any idea of making political capital from it. He has studied it not only from the position of an enthusiast, but as a past master in the great question of transportation which, to my mind, Mr. President, stands foremost among the great problems yet unsolved before the American people and the people of every other country.

The growth and development of the United States have absorbed not only the interest but the capital of this country up to recent years, when it has come to pass that the United States is no longer a little nation, but that gradually is becoming the financial center of the world, and we begin to realize that in order to be prosperous and grow bigger we must find employment for capital as well as labor. That is the proposition which confronts us to-day in the industrial part of this question.

The chairman stated in his explanation of the bill that under its provisions, should it become a law, it was reasonable to expect that within the limit of five years we would have constructed and under construction $50,000,000 worth of shipping in the United States.

The Senator from Georgia claims that we have not the room in our navy-yards nor the facilities to avail ourselves of all the privileges of this measure should it become a law, and this morning he read figures from somebody and from somewhere, I know not, to justify that position. It is a mistake. Leave out the merchant vessels that were put under contract a year and eighteen months ago, when the people, who took an optimistic view of the situation, believed that this bill would pass and become a law. Nine or ten vessels were placed under contract, the owners expecting to build a corresponding number from the foreign trade that they would bring in. That did fill up, to a very great extent, the shipyards that had the facilities of building the larger class of vessels. Not one of those shipyards to-day has a contract for another merchant vessel after those are completed. All the work that is being constructed in the yards in this country to-day is confined to steamers and smaller craft of the coastwise trade and the vessels that are being built for the United States Navy. So far as work in hand and the work in prospect are concerned, it depends almost entirely upon the action of this Congress as to how large the naval appropriations shall be.

This brings me to another question. I am in favor, as is my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], of building up the Navy. I am in sympathy with that policy because I know that every ship we build brings that much more physical protection to us and our commerce. But, Mr. President, it strikes me as being almost a ridiculous proposition to talk of putting millions of dollars into our Navy and adding millions more for the construction of an isthmian canal, for what? For the use of the merchant marine and the navies of other countries. We have nothing on the high seas to protect except our coastwise ships, and they can easily find shelter behind the guns of our fortifications. When the Stars and Stripes are never seen hardly in any port of the world except on naval men-of-war, is not this a commentary upon a policy that would hesitate in the expenditure of a little money to construct, at the same time we are building our Navy, a merchant marine commensurate with our power and our necessity?

The Senator from Georgia said that in the final analysis this question comes down to one proposition, as to whether we can build and operate as cheaply as other countries, and he has undertaken to show that we can. I claim that he has failed in that proposition; and I give figures not from magazine articles nor from newspaper reports, but from the statistics of the United States Government.

It was the aim and purpose of this measure, when it was decided by the committee, separating it into two propositions—first a mail subsidy and then simply a general subsidy—to treat the mail proposition from a distinctive standpoint of necessity, which everyone can appreciate. Everyone knows that we are now engaged in a hand-to-hand contest with foreign nations to secure the commerce of the Orient. We have been foremost and steadfast in our policy to secure the markets of China and hold them as an open door, and with the control of our own archipelago, the Philippines, in a short time we shall be able to put there our own conditions of trade. That is the key of the Orient; and when it has become a naval station, surrounded by all the protection that a maritime fleet would need, it becomes a factor in all commercial conditions of the Orient.

It is the purpose to establish new lines under the postal system, from which the United States Government derives a revenue equal at the present day to over $3,000,000 per annum. It is the purpose of the bill to establish a line to South America. On the east side, the Atlantic coast, of South America we have an enormous trade, and with the exception of that carried by tramp steamers every pound of stuff goes to Liverpool or Hamburg and from thence to South America. Every time it is handled or transferred it pays a cost for doing that to somebody, and in the transaction of that business, the storage and the distribution, the financial part of it comes through the machinery of a foreign government and pays a tribute to them equal to a satisfactory profit on every particle of manufactured goods that we export.

There is no denying that proposition, Mr. President. We can not measure the benefits except by the aid of those who know the conditions and who are competent to figure from the transactions of business just what the result will be. But we do know that England gained her supremacy in the markets of the world and upon the high seas, the expansion of her trade to every part of the world, by pursuing steadily the policy of establishing direct communication. Personal contact is what brings results. When we place New York and Buenos Ayres and Rio de Janeiro in weekly or semiweekly contact by a line of mail steamers, we will open up an avenue for trade yet unknown, because untried.

The same principle, Mr. President, will apply to every other route proposed in this bill. It is a well-known fact that England, Germany, and France are to-day energetically at work to put in the connecting link between the Pacific and the Orient, making propositions and agreeing to the terms of anybody on this side to place in connection with their railroad companies and transportation lines that connecting link between San Francisco and Seattle and China, Manila, and Japan. They are old hands at this business. They have been doing it for a century.

Nothing has disturbed the equilibrium of the shipowner of England and Germany so much as has this bill, which has been discussed openly and publicly upon the floors of Congress for the last two or three years. If I wanted to fortify argument by newspaper articles or articles from magazines or interviews I could fill pages of the RECORD with such articles written in England and Germany, and I could furnish testimony that would show that a concrete effort has been persistently made from the very beginning of the discussion two years ago, by all the influences that could be brought to bear upon Congress, to defeat this measure. I could furnish evidence from the statements of the presidents themselves of some of the largest steamer lines in England that if this new American policy, so mentioned, should be a success, in fifty years the United States would lead the world in ocean transportation.

Now, with reference to the investment of capital, Mr. President. American capital will go wherever it can find a proper return; it does not make any difference upon which side of the Atlantic Ocean that place is. I said a moment ago that we were a creditor instead of a debtor nation. Yet there are millions of American capital now lying in investments abroad that are paying better returns to that capital than it can earn here under the conditions of to-day. That may be one reason why Mr. Morgan or any other capitalist may see fit to invest his money in foreign ships rather than in American ships, because it can be demonstrated as an absolute fact that to put capital into a large steamer in a foreign service for doing exactly what the others are doing and have to do would make a certain loss. And why? Because, as has been claimed and as is true, the cost of the investment is more, the cost of operation is more, and because they go into direct competition with subsidized mail ships all over the world.

The chairman of the committee cited the other day in his explanation the amount of subsidies paid by the great nations. Germany, the last to embark in the enterprise, is to-day exercising the best judgment, increasing wherever a new line can be found that will bring her in contact with new markets, and to-day she is negotiating to put two lines not under a mail subsidy contract with the United States, but two lines from the Pacific coast to the Orient, under subsidies from Germany. France has already adopted the generous subsidy plan of subsidizing, as we propose to do, the whole merchant marine owned in that country, and proposes to go further and to offer extraordinary inducements for the investment of capital in that kind of transportation which she finds she must have in order to compete with Germany and England.

Mr. President, not for the sake of argument, but as a statement of knowledge on my part, I feel absolutely certain that should this bill become a law, before three years have passed every one of the lines provided for in the bill will have been constructed, or nearly so. As the chairman showed the other day in his statement, $4,700,000 per annum is the maximum for the subsidy, with a credit of over $3,000,000 which the United States already receives for the transportation of ocean mails, without taking into consideration the increased postage that we would receive when these new routes are established. This shows that inside of $3,000,000 would probably be the extent to which this Government would be called upon to establish this policy for the first five years.

The Senator from Georgia makes a great point of the fact that the Commissioner of Navigation has changed his views so completely as to perfectly bewilder the Senator. I do not think it is very strange for a man coming as he did into that Department, a novice, from the environments of Democratic education, under influences that have been against all these great economic questions since he was a boy, that coming in contact with facts and figures which brought to him results he should change his mind in reference to the policy which he now advocates, according to the Senator from Georgia.

As far as my experience goes with the Commissioner of Navigation, I find him to be a very efficient and competent officer. I have never asked him for any argument to convince me upon the policy of this question, but I have always found him ready to furnish facts and figures and statistics gathered under the auspices of this Government, without regard to political affiliation, and which upon comparison we have always found to be absolutely correct. Therefore, a reference to the part that he may have in the construction and advocacy of this bill has nothing to do with my judgment upon this question, although I admire him for his candor and ability.

In closing his remarks the Senator from Georgia quoted from the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] in a speech which I well remember, that if it is right to give aid to shipowners of the United States, or those who desire to enter the business, why should not the Goverment give aid to the farmer and to the cattleman? Does it not? Does not this Government give aid to the farmer and the cattlemen by its protective duty, just as it gives aid to Georgia pine on a duty of $2 a thousand, just as it gives protection to sugar in Louisiana and to the sea-island cotton of the Atlantic coast, all of which received the support, if I remember, of some members from those States in the vote on the Dingley bill?

It is the same policy, Mr. President, that I have always advocated and that I advocate to-day. This industry is simply a kindred one, not sought after by anybody who just happened to be engaged in that business, but proposed because it represents a sentiment, aye, a demand which comes from the people of the United States as reflected by every Republican President for the last twenty years in their messages to Congress.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HANNA. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HANNA. Certainly; two or three of them. I should like to hear you on this point.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator contend that the producers of staple products, like cotton, wheat, corn, and those things, of which we produce a surplus and have to export in order to get a market, are benefited by any protective tariff?

Mr. HANNA. You mean wheat, corn, rye, barley, and those things?

Mr. TILLMAN. I mean those things which we produce in such enormous quantities that we have to ship them abroad in order to sell them. After having supplied the home market and keeping out every possible competitor we still have to ship the surplus. I want to know if a protective tariff can in any way protect those products.

Mr. HANNA. I have found, Mr. President, that when there was any talk about reciprocity with Canada a good many farmers in the West got up very high on their hind legs and entered a protest. Protests came from every State that produced the cereals, particularly barley. If a proposition was made to-day to put lumber on the free list, as some of the Northern States want, you would hear a protest from Mississippi and from Georgia and from Texas. If an application was made to remove the duties from sea-island cotton, in competition with the Egyptian cotton, you would hear from the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, there is very little or no competition between the sea-island cotton which we produce and the Egyptian cotton. The manufacture is applied to different uses.

Mr. HANNA. I only mentioned that to bring it home to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood the Senator's personal allusion, but the Senator did not answer my question. He rather dodged it, I thought, if I may be permitted to say so.

Mr. HANNA. Then I will answer it in your own way. I will say I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator whether he still thinks and is ready to contend that any possible tariff on corn or on wheat is a benefit to any person in the West who produces either of those articles?

Mr. HANNA. I certainly do.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator give us any reason for that belief?

Mr. HANNA. I will, Mr. President, when the tariff question is before the Senate, but my time is short, and I wish to finish my speech this evening; not but what I could satisfy myself, though I am sure I could not satisfy the Senator from South Carolina. [Laughter.]

The importance of the trade, Mr. President, with South and Central America never has and never will be fully understood and appreciated until we take hold of it in detail and study it.

We are not attaching—

I quote from an article published in the Protectionist, of Boston, in December, 1901, entitled "Our South American trade:"

We are not attaching sufficient importance to the quantity and value of the importing done by the 60,000,000 people of the principal South and Central American countries bordering on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. The figures for 1900 are as follows:

Country.	Imports.	Our share.
Brazil	$105,000,000	$11,500,000
Uruguay	26,000,000	1,800,000
Argentina	112,000,000	11,500,000
Chile	38,000,000	3,300,000
Peru	8,500,000	1,600,000
Bolivia	11,600,000	60,000
Ecuador	7,000,000	1,200,000
Total	308,100,000	30,960,000

or only about 10 per cent of the business for us.

Putting it another way, it shows:

Country.	Sold by us.	Bought by us.
Brazil	$11,500,000	$58,000,000
Uruguay	1,800,000	1,800,000
Argentina	11,500,000	8,100,000
Chile	3,300,000	7,100,000
Peru	1,600,000	2,100,000
Ecuador	1,200,000	1,500,000
Total	30,900,000	78,600,000

leaving $47,700,000 as the year's balance of trade against us—a very bad showing in these days of our successful trade expansion.

Mr. President, we are the largest purchaser and the largest consumer of the products of those countries, and there is not a single article of manufactured goods which is used in the South American States which could not be produced in the United States; but, as I said a moment ago, we are handicapped by the fact that on every shipment of machinery or merchandise it must go to Liverpool and Hamburg, around two sides of a triangle, be handled in foreign ships, by foreign agents, and the remittances must come through foreign banks, collecting tolls which absolutely produce an embargo upon that traffic and trade.

What would apply to Brazil and to Argentina would apply to every one of the Central and South American states, and in a great measure to every market in the Orient and also to Australia.

Three or four years ago, under the contract provided for in the law of 1891 and by further aid from Australia and New Zealand, a line of steamships was put on between San Francisco and Australia. There is a demand for more steamers to-day, and there are now building two more steamers of the largest class to be put into that trade to take care of it. In three or four years' time, by that personal contact which I have mentioned, that trade has grown to such an extent that a demand is made for doubling the capacity, and that commerce all goes from the United States and returns to it.

It is a well-known fact, Mr. President, that nearly every cotton mill in the South, all of which have been very prosperous in the last few years, finds its market in northern China, and when the opportunity was offered and the rate of freight and contract for delivery could be made which transported those goods from the side track of the mills and delivered them into the warehouses at Hongkong or Yokohama, that trade began to grow and grow, and is to-day the most profitable branch of any manufacturing industry which the Southern States have. I wish that those States might be spotted over with cotton mills, so that the cotton growers and their laborers, who are looking for work, may seize the opportunity when it comes.

I want them to have all possible opportunities, but this question of the connecting link between the producer and the consumer must solve that proposition, and not theorizing as to what it is good policy to do, whether you subsidize a ship or whether you do not. Give them the opportunity for this contact. Bring business men together, the purchaser and the man who has the goods to sell, and they will find a way to exchange commodities or to sell their products. None of us would be willing to admit that the American merchant or the American manufacturer could be outdone in competition in the world's markets by those of any other nation if you place him on an equality with them.

The Senator from Georgia, in expressing his sentiments, expresses mine when he expresses his pride that snch conditions exist. I do not care whether or not he acknowledges the fountain head of that prosperity to be the protective tariff, the policy which for forty years has been the policy of the Republican party. The record of the advancement and the development of this country is our object lesson, and that is as far as I intend to trench upon political matters in the discussion of this subject. But I do want to urge upon this Senate and this Congress as a business proposition, in addition to a patriotic one, not to let this opportunity, which may never again return under like conditions, pass by. Because, Mr. President, if we do not the other fellow will take advantage of this new era in the opening up and the development of the markets of the Orient, when the spirit of trade and the expansion of commerce is enlivening all the world; and when our people have the ability and the facility to accomplish all that could be asked or expected of them, we should stand ready, as the representatives of the American people and of American progress, to step in and do that which they can not do, unless they have the tools with which to do it. That one missing link is the only thing.

If you are going to discuss the subject from the standpoint of economy, give us the opportunity of enjoying the same privileges which other countries enjoy; limit, if you please, our abilities to exactly what theirs are, in order that we may meet them upon common ground, and there will be nobody here to offer any regrets or explanations to his constituents that he ran away from the name of "subsidy" because it had been made odious by demagogues, or because it had been held up as a great bogie man—I do not know a better term—to frighten and hold up children and timid statesmen.

The Senator from Georgia stated that we have frequent mails from both the Pacific and Atlantic ports upon irregular steamers, which I should call tramp steamers. That is true. The United States Government, in order to get any mail at any time to a certain port, is driven to take advantage of whatever steamer may happen to be sailing to that country; and it is only a happening, because there are no regular lines other than those established as mail-subsidy lines by foreign governments. Not even a single steamer of that nature flies the Stars and Stripes to-day, so far as I know.

The reports from the Suez Canal for the last three years show that, out of a passage of thousands of vessels through that great waterway, the American flag was seen but twice in three years, and once that flag was on a yacht. When it is claimed that about 8 per cent of our export trade is carried in American bottoms, I think it is an understatement. I think it is less than it was a year ago; that is, that it is a less percentage regarding the volume, for the trade has extended very largely, and, so far as I know, we have not increased those ships, outside of one or two being built for the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to engage in the foreign trade. Therefore, the argument that the Post-Office Department has the opportunity to occasionally send United States mails by vessels outside of the regular lines falls to the ground if those vessels do not happen to be in port on those days, and they are never there by purpose, but always by accident.

When Great Britain makes a postal contract on all the mails leaving her shores, it is a condition of that contract that the mails shall be carried under the British flag. On the return of her ships from the United States we ship our mails and pay for them, except when an American liner takes them. Great Britain does not leave it open to the lowest bidder, to the competition of the world, but it is to the lowest bidder in competition under her flag, just as this bill proposes as to our mail.

I think it was hardly fair to raise the question in reference to the duties of the Postmaster-General, because it is his duty to regularly advertise for the carrying of the mails and to award the contract to the lowest responsible bidder. To give him the authority and the discretion under the provisions of this bill would be no different from any other contract made by and through the agency of the United States Government.

The Senator from Georgia says he is in favor of our having a better mail service than any other country in the world. So am I. I agree with him upon that proposition. But I want to know how we are going to get a mail service when, during the existence of this law from 1891 until to-day, not a single vessel has been built for the foreign trade, except one or two for the Australian trade, which obtained a further subsidy from New Zealand and Australia. If the law of 1891 is adequate, or, as I believe was claimed, is more than adequate, why has not capital, when money is worth but 2 per cent per annum, been attracted to that kind of investment? No, Mr. President, it is self-evident and can not be denied that under the provisions of the law of 1891 we have got no benefit beyond the four steamers now owned and operated by the International Navigation Company in the north trans-Atlantic trade.

The chairman of our committee, after twenty years of experience and study, after having met every obstacle and objection and argument against these measures, has gone to the minimum by which any sort of benefit could come from any law to lay the foundation for a merchant marine. He has with care and judgment selected the routes for these mail steamers which must appeal to everyone, and appeal most to those who are interested in this great transportation question. He has limited the provisions and the expenditures under this bill to that experiment, and that only, under the mail contracts, and then he has gone to the minimum and, I am afraid, even too low upon the general subsidy proposition. Mr. President, to my mind it is something of an experiment at that rate of compensation, but it can do no harm. If it is a failure as an inducement offered to capital, the Government pays nothing; if it succeeds, then we can afford to encourage it and to extend that limit just as far as it lies within the wisdom of Congress to do.

The matter of contract has been entirely eliminated from this bill. There is no obligation on the part of Congress to go beyond any point of safety that they may fix in their own minds. If at the end of one or two or three years they found that it was a burdensome thing; that it was all in the interest of the shipowner; that it was robbing Peter to pay Paul; that it was taking from the agriculturist and from the cattleman his rights, Congress can repeal it; and the man who invested his money on the basis of 1 cent per 100 miles of travel would lose it. If he is willing to take that risk, certainly the Congress of the United States ought to encourage the experiment that far. But so far as a contract for the carrying of mails is concerned, Mr. President, there is a two-fold important motive of action. First, it brings us into contact with new markets and new peoples in trade; and second, it puts us in a position from a national standpoint which we must take from now onward in our history.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HANNA. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was absent for a moment and did not get the Senator's point, although he may have explained it. I should like to know from him, or from some one, whether we would not be under contract, and would there not be some vested rights here in regard to the mails?

Mr. HANNA. I do not know what the Senator means by vested rights in the mails.

Mr. TILLMAN. What I mean is this: If you pass an act authorizing the payment of certain amounts, and people go forward and build ships with the understanding that they are to have the mails, or to have the subsidy if they do not carry a bag of mail, will they not be in a position to demand that pay and have a vested right there, a contract, so to speak? I am no lawyer, but it just occurred to me that the Senator's disclaimer about repeal would not hold.

Mr. HANNA. I am no lawyer, Mr. President, and I therefore refer my distinguished friend to the lawyers. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, there are plenty of them on that side.

Mr. HANNA. We will bring one here in a day or two to answer the question.

Mr. CLAY. I think the Senator from Ohio will agree with me. This bill provides that the Postmaster-General may make mail contracts to last for a period of ten years.

Mr. HANNA. Fifteen years.

Mr. CLAY. I meant fifteen years. The original act of 1891 provided that contracts might be made for a period of ten years, and this bill changes that from ten to fifteen years. I presume the Senator from Ohio, in speaking in reference to repeal, has reference to the general subsidy. However, I do not agree about that. I believe Congress can repeal a law at any time. Any future Congress can repeal a law which we enact now.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HANNA. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. This time I was going to get after my legal friend on my left [Mr. CLAY].

Mr. HANNA. All right; get after him. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. I am going to ask him whether Congress can repeal an act which authorizes the United States Government to make a contract. Does not our Constitution expressly forbid Congress to pass any act which will impair the obligations of a contract?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. If a former Congress had passed an act providing a subsidy for a period of thirty years, in my opinion the next Congress could have repealed it. It would have been a question of good faith. The question might have arisen as to whether or not in good faith we ought to have kept that agreement, but I do not believe that Congress can make an appropriation for a period of twenty years binding other Congresses. We would not be bound by any such act. The question of good morals and good faith might come up, but as a question of law I believe we could repeal such an act.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. President, I do not care to go into that question, because I do not know anything about it. All I know is that if I make a contract for one year or ten years with responsible parties I expect to keep my contract and expect the other parties to do the same.

The question about contracts for mail service is one thing, but the question about general subsidy is quite another proposition, because there are no contracts to bind the Government.

In closing, I want to say merely a word or two with reference to the analysis proposed by the Senator from Georgia as to what must settle the entire question of the cost of construction and operation. He has given figures with reference to the wages in this country and the wages abroad, all of which are no doubt true. I will admit that the wages in our industrial concerns in this country are fully 50 per cent higher than they are abroad, and I am willing also to admit that their productive capacity per capita is almost double that of the workmen of any other country. But still the fact remains that when a man goes into the market to buy anything, after taking advantage of all the competition that surrounds him, he buys from those who will sell the best thing for the least money. When a man wants a ship built and half a dozen shipyards want to build it for him, he has the benefit of the competition; and when he makes a contract he is supposed to have made a contract satisfactory to himself.

A statement was made by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce the other day alluding to a letter of a gentleman named Baker, who, I believe, is the president of the Atlantic Transport Company, in which he said that he had made contracts for vessels in Europe and in this country of the same class and at about the same time. I have here a copy of that letter. It reads:

ATLANTIC TRANSPORT LINE,
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Baltimore, October 17, 1901.

DEAR MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Referring to my letter of March 16, 1901, and replying to your request with regard to relative difference in cost of ships, our company at present have a contract for two ships with Messrs. Harland & Wolff, Limited, Belfast (one of which will be completed very early in the spring, and the other a little latter, say during the summer), of exactly the same size, dimensions, and all particulars as two ships we have contracted for with the New York Shipbuilding Company, of Camden.

The cost of the English-built ship, as near as possible (we having just completed two of exactly the same size, dimensions, and speed), will be about £292,000 ($1,419,120). The same identical ship built at the works of the New York Shipbuilding Company will cost us a little over £380,000 ($1,846,800).

In addition to this, we are building two steamers with the New York Shipbuilding Company of smaller dimensions, for which we have a contract, at £150,000 each ($729,000). Also two ships of exactly the same dimensions with the Maryland Steel Company, Sparrows Point, for £150,000 each ($729,000). We have two ships of identically the same detail, delivered to us in the last twelve months, built by Messrs. Harland & Wolff, Belfast, one of which cost us £110,000 ($534,600) and the other £100,000 ($486,000).

Yours, very truly,

B. N. BAKER, President.

EUGENE T. CHAMBERLAIN, Esq.,
Commissioner of Navigation, Washington, D. C.

There is no better way to settle the question as to the cost of a thing than what you pay for it. According to the letter which I have just read, there are four ships being built in shipyards in the United States identical in specifications all through with other ships built in Ireland, and there are four more being built at Baltimore identical with four being constructed in England or Ireland, constructed on the same specifications—and you all know what that means—and yet at a difference in cost of about 25 per cent. So far as I know, those are the latest contracts for ships of that size and intended for the purposes which we are discussing more than anything else I know of in this country.

As to the cost of operating ships, you have only to turn to the report of the majority of the committee, and you will find the figures given of the amounts paid on the American lines, on the English lines, on the German lines, on the French lines, and on the Scandinavian lines differ in about the same proportion; and the average is from 25 to 30 per cent.

In reply to the Senator from Georgia upon the coolie question, I admit that he knows more about that than I do; but I have investigated the facts, and have found that in the Asiatic trade it is an absolute necessity to carry Chinamen and coolie labor in the fire holds of those ships. It is the only labor that can live and endure those conditions, and for that reason they are employed, but only in the Asiatic trade. I do not believe there is one of them upon an American ship outside of the Pacific mail steamships engaged in the trade from San Francisco to Yokohama and Hongkong.

In the North Atlantic and the Mediterranean trade and in all of the trade between Europe and the United States the difference in wages is exactly 27 per cent, as I figure the percentage, upon all vessels, taking an average of the French, the German, and the English lines. I had a little object lesson——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Ohio pardon me for a moment?

Mr. HANNA. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I presume the Senator is entirely correct, but there is one remark of the Senator which would lead to misapprehension of the facts. He spoke of the necessity of having Chinese in the fire holds of the ship, indicating that he thought they were confined to that employment. I simply desire, asking him to pardon me for the interruption, to state that they are not confined to that part of the service.

Mr. HANNA. I understand that cooly labor or Chinese labor, or whatever it is called, is employed upon some of the steamers in the China trade, but I know of no other than the trade to Asia in which they are employed, and as we have only the Pacific Mail Line I merely got the figures from it. That line employs them in the fire room only and as coal passers and for that kind of work.

Now, if the settlement of this question is resolved into the proposition whether or not the inducements offered in this bill will accomplish the purpose sought, the only way we can test it is to try it, and the only aid we can invoke in the settlement of that question in our own minds is to profit by the experience of others and take their figures. If we have any respect for the enterprise and the progress of our competitors in Europe, we will not wait until they subsidize lines that will take and occupy the new fields, so that by the time we have made up our minds to try the experiment on the part of the Government of the United States, we shall find we are too late.

That is not Americanism. That is not the spirit which should actuate an American Congress in dealing with a proposition which is entirely foreign to any political suggestion, but is simply a part of our great and growing development to which we take pride in pointing, as does my friend, the Senator from Georgia. It is necessary, in order to keep pace with the progress of the world, exercising the intelligence and experience of which we are proud, with all the natural advantages that have come to us as a gift from Heaven, placing the responsibility upon us to improve those opportunities. I make it more as an appeal than as an argument that at least those who have not been entirely convinced upon this question shall give the American people the opportunity to make the experiment.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE POLK.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. RUFUS KING POLK, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had appointed Mr. HENRY D. GREEN, Mr. J. K. P. HALL, Mr. C. F. WRIGHT, Mr. HOWARD MUTCHLER, Mr. GEORGE R. PATTERSON, Mr. CHARLES DICK, Mr. J. M. GRIGGS, Mr. WILLIAM RICHARDSON, Mr. ARTHUR L. BATES, Mr. JAMES R. YOUNG, Mr. D. H. MERCER, Mr. W. L. STARK, Mr. MARCUS A. SMITH, Mr. FRANK E. WILSON, and Mr. L. P. PADGETT as the committee on the part of the House to take charge of the funeral arrangements.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 5, 1902.

Resolved, That the House has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. RUFUS KING POLK, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That in his death the State has lost an able, devoted, and patriotic servant.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Speaker be authorized to appoint a committee to superintend and attend the funeral of deceased.

The Speaker announced the appointment of Messrs. HENRY D. GREEN, J. K. P. HALL, C. F. WRIGHT, HOWARD MUTCHLER, GEORGE R. PATTERSON, CHARLES DICK, J. M. GRIGGS, WILLIAM RICHARDSON, ARTHUR L. BATES, JAMES R. YOUNG, D. H. MERCER, W. L. STARK, MARCUS A. SMITH, FRANK E. WILSON, and L. P. PADGETT members of the committee on the part of the House.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to his memory the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask for their immediate consideration by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania submits resolutions and asks for their present consideration. The resolutions will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. RUFUS KING POLK, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That a committee of six Senators be appointed by the presiding officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolutions were considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair appoints as the committee on the part of the Senate the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON].

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the resolutions just adopted, the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 7, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 6, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LEWIS of Pennsylvania, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

JOSIAH H. BUCKINGHAM.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1198) granting a pension to Josiah H. Buckingham, with Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

In line 6 strike out "Josiah" and insert "Joshua."

Amend the title.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

MAHLON C. MOORES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 8541) granting an increase of pension to Mahlon C. Moores, with a Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

In line 8 strike out "forty" and insert "twenty-five."

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendment and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to, and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. SULLOWAY, Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, and Mr. MIERS of Indiana.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 7675. An act to construct a light-house keeper's dwelling at Calumet Harbor;

H. R. 8587. An act for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1893, and commonly known as the Bowman Act; and

H. R. 199. An act for the establishment of a light station on Bluff Shoal, Pamlico Sound, North Carolina.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 3830. An act for the relief of William C. Marr; and

H. R. 7933. An act providing for the commutation for townsite purposes of homestead entries in certain portions of Oklahoma.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 306. An act for the relief of Leonard L. Dietrick;

S. 458. An act making an appropriation for completing the construction of the road to the national cemetery near Pensacola, Fla.;

S. 590. An act for the relief of the Mille Lac Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota;

S. 306. An act for the relief of Leonard L. Dietrick—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 342. An act for the relief of the heirs of Aaron Van Camp and Virginius P. Chapin—to the Committee on Claims.

RURAL FREE-DELIVERY SERVICE.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 11728.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (with Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts in the chair) and resumed the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11728) to classify the rural free-delivery service and fix the compensation to employees thereof.

Mr. LOUD. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL], for an hour.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, the arguments that have so far been made in opposition to this bill have been based entirely upon two erroneous assumptions. It is quite apparent that we shall proceed much more intelligently with this discussion after we have eliminated these two false premises from the debate. The first of these is the assumption that the advocates of this bill are unfriendly to rural free delivery or to its further extension. It ought not to be necessary to call attention to the error and absolute absurdity of this assumption. Everyone who has sat in this Chamber during the last few years knows that rural free delivery has never had a more intelligent, earnest, and consistent advocate than the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], who for many years has presided over the Post-Office Committee with absolute fearlessness and always with an eye single to the best interests of the public. I also think that I express the sentiments of all the members of that committee who favor this bill when I say that they are all earnest advocates of the extension of the rural free-delivery system to its utmost usefulness and efficiency.

Personally I am in favor of this bill, because I am in favor of the extension of rural free delivery until it serves every household in the United States; and I believe it is under the principle involved in this bill, and only under that principle, that this extension can take place. The character of postal service of a people is a good index to the character of the people. The more enlightened and intelligent and enterprising the people the more efficient will be their postal service. At the present time the city delivery and the Railway Mail Service in the United States constitute the best system in the world. At the same time the progressive nations of Europe excel us in the matter of rural free delivery.

Probably Great Britain at the present time stands at the head in this respect. If my recollection is correct, since 1888, the year of the Queen's jubilee, the postal service of Great Britain has accommodated every household in the United Kingdom. In our country at the present time the free delivery serves 34,000,000 people in less than 900 cities. About 4,000,000 people are now served by the rural free-delivery service. In other words, there are now in this country 40,000,000 people who have no delivery service. I look forward with confident hope and anticipation to a period not farther removed than ten years from the present time when every householder in this country shall enjoy the benefits of the rural free-delivery service.

Our country is not only a large agricultural country. Our farms are large, and under our system of agriculture our farmer lives on the farm which he cultivates. Therefore, in the rural districts the houses are remote from each other. During the past few years there has been a decided tendency in all parts of this country, except some portions of the South, toward a concentration of the population in our great cities. All students of social economics have looked upon this tendency with more or less apprehension; and the question has been raised, Why is it that rural life has become so distasteful to the enterprising young men of your country?

Probably the principal reason is the exclusion, the isolation, the social loneliness, of the typical American farm. Now, in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, there are four agencies which, within a very few years, will revolutionize the country life of the United States. Those four agencies are, first, the construction of good roads; second, the perfection of the cheap storage electric battery which can be readily applied to vehicles for the transportation of travelers and freight and to the operation of farm machinery; third, the production of electricity directly from the consumption of coal or other fuel, and its cheap adaptation for furnishing heat, light, and motive power; and, fourth, the extension to all parts of the country of the rural free-delivery service.

The benefits and the comforts to come from the free delivery of mails in this country do not rest entirely upon the reception of letters, pamphlets, and advertisements; no, Mr. Chairman, not even upon the reception of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, although I can picture in my imagination, when this service has been extended, the eager anticipation with which all members of the household will look forward to receiving this periodical. The little children of the family will throw aside their stories of thrilling adventure and hairbreadth escapes, of shipwrecks and imprisonment, to find in the columns of this periodical the exciting accounts of passages at arms; and the elder members of the family will find in perusing the debates and discussions of this Chamber instruction and enlightenment. [Laughter and applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, the principal benefits that will come to those living in the country districts from the perfection of the rural free delivery will result from the cheap and constant distribution of the books and magazines containing our best literature. Extend the rural free delivery to every hamlet and farm in this country, and you thereby encourage the establishment in every center of population of a circulating library. When the rural free-delivery service has been completed, books on biography, travel, history, and fiction will find their way into the smallest farmhouse in the country. Taking this broad view of the problem, Mr. Chairman, we must admit that, aside from our free school, the perfected rural free-delivery system will be the most potent agency in the education, the enlightenment, and the advancement of our people.

And so, Mr. Chairman, because I am heartily in favor of the extension of this service I favor the passage of this bill substantially in its present form.

The second false assumption which the opponents of this bill have made is this, that there is already in existence a rural free-delivery system established by law, and that the advocates of this measure are attempting, as one of the gentlemen arguing against this bill said, to substitute some other system for it, or, as the eloquent gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] expressed it, the advocates of this bill are attempting to revolutionize the present system, or, as the gentleman from Georgia expressed it, we are trying to reform the present system.

This error is the most serious one that has been made in this debate. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, there is no rural free-delivery system established by law at the present time. This bill aims to establish such a system. What is the history of this service, Mr. Chairman? In the appropriation bill for the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year 1894 this clause was inserted:

> For free-delivery service, including existing experimental free-delivery offices, $11,254,900, of which the sum of $10,000 shall be applied under the direction of the Postmaster-General to experimental free delivery in rural communities other than towns and villages.

This appropriation of $10,000 for the fiscal year 1894 was not used. The same sum was appropriated the next year and unused. The same sum was appropriated the next year and unused. For the fiscal year 1897 $40,000 was similarly appropriated and 44 routes established, the first route having been established at Charleston, W. Va., in October, 1896. In 1898 $50,000 was appropriated, and at the end of that year there were 148 routes in operation. In 1899 $150,000 was appropriated, and there were 391 routes in operation. In 1900 $450,000 was appropriated, and there were 1,276 routes in operation. In 1901 $1,750,000 was appropriated, and there were 4,301 routes in operation. For the fiscal year 1902 over $3,000,000 was appropriated, and on the 1st of this month there were in operation 7,700 routes.

The clause in the appropriation bill for this year relating to rural free deliveries is the same clause that has been incorporated into the bill for the last six or seven years, which is as follows:

> For experimental rural free delivery, including pay of carriers, horse-hire allowance, supplies, and mechanical appliances, $3,500,000.

With an appropriation of over $3,000,000, with 7,700 routes in operation, there is, as I have said, no rural free-delivery system authorized and established by law. The only law on the statute books relating to rural free delivery is the clause contained in the two lines and a half that I have read making an appropriation for the service.

What, then, is the situation, Mr. Chairman, that confronts us? Simply this: There is not only no rural free-delivery system to-day, but that clause which has appeared for several years in these appropriation bills could at any time have been stricken out in the consideration of those bills before this Chamber on a point of order. If this bill or some bill establishing a system does not pass, then when the Post-Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1903 comes before us for consideration, the appropriation for the maintenance of that service can at any time be eliminated from the bill by raising the point of order. So when members speaking in opposition to this bill say that the advocates of this bill are attempting to upset a system, revolutionize or to reform an existing system, they are arguing upon a false and purely gratuitous assumption.

There is no system, and it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the time has come in the history of this service, when the real friends of rural free delivery must come to the front, establish a system, and prevent the possibility of the appropriation for the service going out at any time upon a point of order. Heretofore and up to the present time this service has been spoken of as an experimental service. Can we, Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, speak longer of this system as an experimental system, which demands over $4,000,000 a year, and which operates over 7,000 routes at the present time? It seems to me that it is only part of good housekeeping, it is only part of our duty as trustees for the people to give our best consideration at the present time to the establishment of a system for the operation and extension of this valuable service. Now, with these two false premises eliminated from the debate, let us proceed to consider what was in the minds of the members of the Post-Office Committee when they undertook to frame this bill.

Mr. Chairman, as I said, there were in operation on the 1st of March 7,700 rural free-delivery routes. The framers of this bill in the first place had to look to a system which would take care not only of these 7,700 routes, but a system under which the service could be extended to include within six or eight or ten years as many as 50,000 routes. The Department, Mr. Chairman, estimates that the country available for rural free-delivery service can now be covered by about 50,000 routes, and I for one look forward to the time when this service can be extended as an efficient service over these 50,000 routes. The first thing then that the committee had to consider was not merely the present condition of the service, but the extension of this service in the future, the creation of a system where none now exists, and the creation of such a system as could be extended to cover 50,000 routes in ten years, and if necessary, 75,000 or 100,000 routes in the next twenty-five years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think it would be well to refer briefly to this bill of a little over two pages and to consider the system that the Post-Office Committee presents for the approval or disapproval of the House. Let us see how nearly it comes to establishing a system that will meet the demands not only of the service of the present time, but of the future, bearing in mind that there is no system established by law at the present time and that this measure proposes to establish such a system.

It first provides that on and after July 1, 1902, the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to classify the rural free-delivery service and fix the compensation to employees. First, subagents of divisions are provided for, at a salary of $2,400 a year; second, four classes of special agents, with salaries ranging from thirteen hundred to not exceeding sixteen hundred dollars a year; third, route inspectors in four classes, with salaries ranging from nine hundred to not exceeding twelve hundred dollars a year; fourth, clerks in four classes, ranging from nine hundred to not exceeding twelve hundred dollars per annum.

That is the basis of a free-delivery system under which the routes are to be established.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I should like to ask the gentleman a question at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. BOUTELL. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. In what do these four propositions you have just recited in the bill differ from this heterogeneous method that we now have—for it is not a system—of rural free delivery? In other words, is not this just what the Department is to-day doing, and are you not adopting in this bill the present method pursued by the Department?

Mr. BOUTELL. I see, Mr. Chairman, that the second false assumption to which I alluded has taken very strong hold of the members of this House. There is no system legalized by law at the present time. We simply appropriate, in less than three lines, a lump sum of money, which is turned over to the Postmaster-General to be expended in his discretion; and that appropriation can be stricken from any bill by a point of order, so that it is our duty, it seems to me, at the present time, to safeguard this service by establishing such a system that the appropriations for its maintenance may always be in order.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, another interruption. I am surprised that the gentleman disregards utterly the question asked and pursues a line not in controversy at all. The question asked in this: Have you not in this bill adopted just what this lack of system is using now in the expenditure of this $3,000,000?

Mr. BOUTELL. Possibly the gentleman from Michigan and myself are at variance through a lack of understanding of the term "system."

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Oh, no.

Mr. BOUTELL. I refer to the establishment of a system as the legalizing of a system or a bureau by law, so that these appropriations will be in order. These officials are the same officials, and, I understand, with substantially the same salaries that have been fixed by the Postmaster-General in his discretion; but we fix it now by law, so that hereafter there may be no question as to whether our appropriations for this service shall be in order or not.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Now you are coming to the very point in issue—that you are simply adopting in this bill what is already practically in effect. Is not that true?

Mr. BOUTELL. Yes; in the discretion of the Department.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. So that we have a system waiting simply to be legalized by law.

Mr. BOUTELL. Exactly.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is all.

Mr. BOUTELL. And that is what this bill does exactly.

Mr. HILL. May I make a suggestion?

Mr. BOUTELL. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I have not yet heard upon the floor of this House any question as to the first part of this bill. There is no dispute on that proposition.

Mr. BOUTELL. There is no dispute that we have no system now.

Mr. HILL. Oh, no; but it is entirely proper to adopt the first part of the bill. So far as the gentleman has gone, I have heard no discussion of that question.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. And that is the whole system.

Mr. BOUTELL. Precisely so. The fallacy of the assumption that this bill upsets a system is demonstrated by the admissions of the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Connecticut——

Mr. HILL. Not at all.

Mr. BOUTELL. That we are establishing a system which heretofore has existed, not in the law, but in the discretion of the Department.

Mr. HILL. The first part of the gentleman's remarks is hardly fair, because nobody has assumed that the Post-Office Committee has upset the administrative part of it here. That is all agreed to substantially. I have heard no controversy on that question. It is simply the question of actual work in the field where the upsetting is to take place by the bill.

Mr. BOUTELL. If the gentleman from Connecticut has heard no claim that this bill is upsetting a system, then he has heard no argument against this bill except his own, for the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] said that here is a measure brought in to revolutionize this free-delivery system, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] maintained that here was a bill brought in to reform the existing system, and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] claimed that they were substituting one system for another.

Mr. WARNOCK. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BOUTELL. Certainly.

Mr. WARNOCK. Have not all those remarks been exclusively addressed to what is known as the contract feature of this bill?

Mr. BOUTELL. The arguments were directed against the whole bill. I have heard no discussion of the paragraphs read, nor have I heard it alluded to in any of the debates on the floor of the House, yet the arguments have been directed generally against the whole bill.

Mr. LANDIS. Against putting the mail carrier under contract.

Mr. WARNOCK. The arguments have been against the contract system of the bill, in putting the carriers under contract.

Mr. BOUTELL. I admit that gentlemen who have brought forward their arguments against this bill have not been specific in their debate; but as an advocate of this bill I must endeavor, if I can, to answer such arguments as have been made against it. This bill has been described as a measure to upset a system, and upon this point that I have now made there is apparently no controversy. To this the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut seems to agree, that it is the part of good housekeeping for us to perfect or establish a system, whether the system advocated by my good friend from Connecticut, or the system proposed by the committee; but some system we must have, or hereafter the money which supports this system can at any time go out of the bill on a point of order.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as there is no question about the paragraphs that I have read, I will now proceed to the paragraph about which there is such a diversity of opinion. I will now read this paragraph for the first time that it has been read in the House, and I shall ask gentlemen who have argued against the bill to take the trouble of following the reading of this section:

Hereafter all mail service on rural free-delivery mail routes shall be performed by carriers designated pursuant to an advertisement inviting competitive bidding, except as herein otherwise provided.

First. That before any person shall be designated to carry the mail on any mail rural free-delivery route, the Postmaster-General shall cause an advertisement to be posted for not less than ten days, in a conspicuous place accessible to the public, in the post-office from which the mail is to be carried, inviting proposals, in such form as he may prescribe, for the service to be performed. The service shall be awarded to the lowest bidder who shall furnish evidence satisfactory to the Postmaster-General that such bidder is a legal and actual resident of the district or territory in which the proposed service is to be performed; that he is a reliable and trustworthy person, of good moral character, able to read and write, and having sufficient intelligence and ability to properly perform the service, and who shall tender sufficient guaranties that he will personally perform acceptable service; but the Postmaster-General may reject all proposals submitted under any advertisement: Provided, That no person shall be awarded a contract for more than one route under this paragraph.

Second. That no additional compensation shall be allowed to a rural free-delivery carrier unless pursuant to an advertisement and award of service as herein provided.

Third. That under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe, a substitute carrier may be employed, at the expense of the regular carrier, to temporarily perform the service on any rural free-delivery mail route.

Fourth. That rural free-delivery carriers heretofore appointed and now in the service may be continued as carriers, at a rate of compensation not exceeding $600 per annum, until such time as the Postmaster-General shall advertise for proposals and make awards for the several routes on which such carriers are now employed.

The Postmaster-General may allow such per diem and other incidental expenses in connection with the rural free-delivery service as Congress may from time to time provide.

Before considering in detail the arguments in favor of letting these routes by contract, I would also like to eliminate from the debate any opposition to this system that may be based upon the frauds and corruption and inefficient service that resulted from the old star-route system. There is no more similarity between the old star-route system and the contract system provided for in this bill than there is between the financial views held by my distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and the financial views held by our mutual friend from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

What were the facts out of which grew the frauds, the corruption, and the inefficiency in the contract system to which this has been compared on the floor of this House, and to which it is now being compared by a portion of the press of the country? Under the old contract system a contractor, either an individual or a corporation, could bid for and secure as many routes as he chose to accept. Secondly, the Postmaster-General had the discretion under the law, or some Postmasters-General thought they had the power under the law, to give additional compensation to those contractors. Third, those contractors were able to sublet these contracts to persons not living on the route. What then was the result? By collusion the contractor would bid away below what the service was worth—say, $5,000 for a certain route—and by bidding below the cost of the service he could obtain, and often did obtain, many thousands of these routes.

The Post-Office Department could then reimburse him for his expenses, and, say, give him $5,000 more on a $5,000 route. Then the contractor could sublet these contracts. He was not even limited to a person living on the route. Now, I ask, Mr. Chairman, any members of this House who have been led to believe that there was any similarity between the provisions of this bill and the old star-route business, I ask them in all fairness to take these facts that made these frauds possible and compare them with this section of this bill. By this bill the contractor must be not only a legal but actual resident in the very neighborhood where the mail is to be delivered. He can have but one route at a time.

The Department is powerless to give him any further compensation than the amount of his bid. Every possible avenue for the entrance of fraud has been safeguarded in this measure. Now, then, let us see what kind of a man this bidder must be, for these contracts are not to be let to the lowest bidder, as has been argued upon this floor. The man who gets one of these contracts must be the lowest bidder who has all of these six qualifications: First, he must be an actual and legal resident of the district or territory in which the service is to be performed; and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that is a most salutary provision in a service of this character.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman pardon me an interruption?

Mr. BOUTELL. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman does not wish to be interrupted in his argument, I will not do so. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the statement just made, that under the new system in the star-route service collusion in contracts is impossible. I stated the day before yesterday the case of a contractor living here in Washington, who, under the new system, is to-day carrying the star-route service in the city of Bridgeport, Conn., under the new system. That gentleman is Mr. W. B. Catchings. The mail is addressed to W. B. Catchings; and if that thing can be done in the Fourth Congressional district of Connecticut, and be done under the new law, it can equally well be done in other districts, and the new system becomes degenerated to the same thing as the old.

Mr. BOUTELL. Not at all, Mr. Chairman; but, on the other hand, the provisions in this section guard against any such possible result as the gentleman speaks of. But, as I was saying, this contractor must be the lowest bidder, and first an actual, legal resident of the district; second, reliable and trustworthy; third, of good moral character; fourth, able to read and write; fifth, of sufficient intelligence and ability to properly perform the service; sixth, he must give sufficient guaranty that he will personally perform acceptable service. And I may say, in commenting upon these six qualifications, that one of the gentlemen who made a most strenuous argument in opposition to the bill asked the chairman of the Post-Office Committee, a few hours before he made the argument, to point out anywhere in this bill where there was any provision that required the contractor to personally perform the service.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What have been the requirements heretofore in regard to subletting in the star-route service, in order to compare them with these provisions?

Mr. BOUTELL. Does the gentleman object to the provision that there shall be no subletting?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Illinois has well stated the provisions of this bill and the prerequisites for the appointment of a carrier. Now, I would like to have him state what the prerequisites were under the old star-route service, in order to compare the two.

Mr. BOUTELL. I have not the law with reference to the star-route service here, and if I had, my limited time would prevent my commenting upon that.

Mr. LOUD. The present law is that it shall be let to the lowest and best bidder, the usual form that applies to all the service.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do they not look into his moral character?

Mr. LOUD. Not under the law.

Mr. BOUTELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, having gone over this bill and having arrived at some understanding of the method in which these contractors are to be appointed and the method in which the work is to be done, let us see if we can find some good, sound, valid reasons for adopting this system as a new system. There is no system now in operation. The entire service is managed absolutely under the discretion of the Department, and I wish to say here that it is to the great credit of the Department and to the officials who have had this service directly in charge that they have given such an excellent and efficient service as to lead the people to insist that we shall have a permanent system, and that this service shall not only be made permanent, but be extended to its utmost capacity.

The principal reason, Mr. Chairman, and it seems to me a very apparent and cogent reason, for this system is this, that all these routes differ from each other in length, in character, territory, in the number of inhabitants, and in the climate in which they exist. It has been asked here, as an argument against this proposition, why do not we put the city carriers under the contract system? It hardly seems possible that anyone should think that such a suggestion is an argument against this bill. The service of all city carriers is substantially the same. The amount of service to be rendered by the carriers in cities is sufficient to require the employment in every city of a large number of men working substantially the same number of hours.

In my own city of Chicago we have 13 buildings which require the entire service of one or more carriers and 2 buildings in our city which require the entire services of four carriers, but I imagine that the distribution of the mail on one floor of the Marquette Building is about the same as the distribution on another floor of that building. I imagine that the distribution of the mail in the Rookery is about the same as the distribution of the mail in the Monadnock Building. I think it is apparent that the ordinary labor of a carrier in the city of New York is substantially like that of a carrier in the city of Chicago, although, of course, the greater desirability of Chicago as a place of residence might induce the Chicago carriers to consent to a salary less than the salaries of those who are compelled to live in New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANDIS. Now, that being true, and there being such a uniformity about it, would not that be a good service to let out by contract?

Mr. BOUTELL. Not at all, because all these men are doing similar service, and there is sufficient work to employ a large number of men, working the regulation eight hours a day, and responsible to one chief; whereas the rural delivery service, if we make it, as I hope we shall, cover the entire United States, must be transacted over some routes 30 or 40 miles long and over others only 5 or 10 or 15 miles long. The point I am endeavoring to make——

Mr. LANDIS. You can put it under a supervisor, just as it is now.

Mr. BOUTELL. When we get this service so extended that it will cover, as I hope it will, fifty or one hundred thousand routes, there must in the very nature of the case be some uniform system by which the pay on these routes shall be provided. And the carrier on each route should receive the full value of his services.

Now, to come back to my first point, the strongest argument for this contract system is the dissimilarity in the routes when we shall have covered the whole country. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see a system adopted at this session of Congress which will look to the extension of this service over the entire territory of the United States; and it seems to me, with the diversity of routes that must necessarily exist when this service is so extended, there is no other system of compensation that will be as fair and just to the carriers and as satisfactory to the public as this contract system.

Now, just one word in reference to the possibility of extending the service under the contract system and the difficulties of extending it under any other system. To give the simplest illustration, suppose we picture in our minds as on a map the typical county seat of, say, 3,500 inhabitants. Let us suppose that the turnpikes have been so laid out as to make the most ideal arrangement for routes of uniform length, and therefore for the establishment of a salaried system. Such a construction of the turnpikes, I take it, would be turnpikes running from the county seat like the spokes of a wheel.

Now, suppose we had running out from this county seat eight turnpikes. Then let us suppose that each of these turnpikes, after running out 10 miles, strikes another turnpike, so that you can have this sort of a route—an ideal route under a uniform salaried system. Suppose a carrier starts from the county seat and goes due east on the turnpike 10 miles, then northwestwardly on another turnpike 10 miles, then southwestwardly 10 miles, back to the county seat. There you have a 30-mile route along an equilateral triangle; and if all the 30-mile routes in the country were arranged like that (which would be an ideal system), what then would be the result?

I say, Mr. Chairman, that the contract system provided for in this bill will enable us to cover a greater extent of territory and serve a greater number of people than any other system. The space within the lines of that equilateral triangle, bounded by those turnpikes, will be covered by dirt roads, running down here into a river bottom, and there on a hill, and winding backward and forward from one turnpike to another, with farmhouses scattered all along their meandering courses.

Now, under this system one contract can be let for the 30-mile route around the triangle, and within the triangle a small route running off one turnpike and back on to another, about 15 miles, can be let under another contract for an entirely different sum, and both contractors will be satisfied; and when this service has been extended over the entire country I think it will be found that the number of routes that are similar to the 30-mile route that I have described will fall far below the number of the shorter routes that are off the turnpikes.

So, then, it seems perfectly clear to me, Mr. Chairman, that if we are to establish a system not only for the present, not only for the immediate future, but for the time when this system will accommodate all the inhabitants of this country, we have here an ideal system, and that under any other system the service could not be so extended.

If, then, this contract system should be adopted, the different routes will be awarded to the bidders for exactly the sums for which they are willing to do the work, and under this system we accomplish what it will be difficult, if not impossible, to accomplish under any other system; that is, the equalizing of the compensation.

I know that my friend from Connecticut has made what it seems to me has been the only practical suggestion that has been made for equalizing the compensation of these carriers. His suggestion, if I recollect it, is for a uniform or a substantially uniform compensation for the carriers and a graduated allowance for the hire of the horse and wagon. But, Mr. Chairman, suppose that the contractors going out from the same county seat get, as they must get, the same graduated allowance for horse hire under the plan suggested by the gentleman from Connecticut; they will also get, whether operating on a long or a short route, a difficult or an easy route, the same annual compensation by way of salary; and the more you extend this system the more the inequality and diversity in the routes manifest themselves.

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman disapproves of that, why does not his committee recommend a change in regard to the city carriers, for in this very bill the committee has reported $650,000 to provide for just this thing, with 1,479 city carriers. If the proposition is not a good one with reference to the rural carriers, why is it a good one and why do you indorse it with reference to the city carriers and report an appropriation of $650,000 for next year, so that the city carriers may go on with this service?

Mr. BOUTELL. The gentleman refers to the horse hire?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir—for next year, I mean.

Mr. BOUTELL. The gentleman from Connecticut asks me why the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads does not do it?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTELL. I shall have to plead in extenuation of any lack of reply on that subject that I am an entire novice on the Post-Office Committee and have not heretofore participated in their discussions or hearings, and my arguments on this bill are simply addressed to it as an individual and not as a comparative measure.

Mr. HILL. I would say in reply that the gentleman is not a novice in making an argument; he is not a novice on financial questions or on any other subject; but I fully agree with him so far as his argument has gone that he is a novice on the question of the Post-Office Committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELL. I hope before I get through to convince the gentleman from Connecticut that I am not much more of a novice on the contract system than the gentleman from Connecticut is on the coinage system. I hope honors will be easy on this subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. You need not worry.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] know that the rural system is carried on under rules and regulations prescribed by the Postmaster-General——

Mr. BOUTELL. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And that the Postmaster-General can increase or diminish the salary just as the work on the route increases or diminishes, or just as it happens to be a short route or a long one? For instance, for one that is 10 miles pay, say, $400; for one that is 15 miles pay, say, $500, and for one that is 25 miles, $600, as I understand is done at present. That is a subject of rules and regulations, and he could apply it just as well to that wheel picture that you so well drew a few moments ago as to the contract system.

Mr. BOUTELL. I would say to the gentleman from Tennessee that doubtless he could, and I understand at the present time he does that to a certain extent. But at the present time the entire management of the service is in the discretion of the Department, and the fundamental basis of this bill is the necessity of establishing a system, and I submit, in all candor to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], whether he thinks that by establishing a system which will eventually cover fifty or seventy-five or one hundred thousand carriers, their compensation should be left entirely to the discretion of the Department? Ought it not to be our duty as representatives of the people to see and provide the way in which this money is to be expended?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think it ought to be fixed as far as possible, but owing to the topography of the United States varying so much, some routes being over roads that are rough, some in the bottoms and some in the mountains, some in the blue-grass region of Tennessee, and some in other portions of the country with similar variations, large discretion must necessarily be left to the Postmaster-General in managing the routes, the length of routes, and the salaries.

Mr. BOUTELL. The statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] supports the very argument I have been making in favor of this system, viz, the diversities of these routes necessarily demand diversity in compensation, and while we are legislating for the general necessities of the public, we must remember that carriers—both rural as well as municipal—are part of the public, and it is our duty to see that they are amply paid for the service which they render, and the gentleman's very statement of these diversities and inequalities form the very basis of my argument, which is that the system established in this bill—so far as the carriers are concerned—is simply the ideal system. It simply works automatically; every man gets for his service exactly what he asks for it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you think it is practical to take all discretion away from the Postmaster-General and make it a matter of law, a matter of statute?

Mr. BOUTELL. That is my idea.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. To take it entirely away from the Postmaster-General and make it a matter of law?

Mr. BOUTELL. Yes; in reference to this system.

Mr. THAYER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOUTELL. Yes.

Mr. THAYER. After all said and done, if your bill went into effect, would not you be following the system which you complain so much about, which is now in vogue in all details absolutely, with the single exception that whereas now the carriers come in under the civil service you let the service out to public auction? Is not that the only distinction there is between the system now which, whether temporary or permanent, is well established and the system which you propose to establish? Is not the system that you propose to establish identical with it in every practical detail except the manner of getting the carriers?

Mr. BOUTELL. I will say in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] it is hard to answer his question, because there is no system established by law at the present time, as I endeavored to explain in the first part of my argument; that is, there are now only——

Mr. THAYER. Is it not a matter of fact that there is a system, as perfect as any other that could be established, in the way of examinations and appointments and the salaries each shall receive and the number of inspectors—in short, everything in detail as definitely as is provided for in your bill and like your bill, excepting that the Post-Office Department appoints the carriers upon merit after a civil-service examination, and yours lets this service out at auction to the lowest bidder.

Mr. BOUTELL. The gentleman is correct in saying there is a service; but no system for carrying on or extending the service has yet been established by law, and the time has come when we ought to provide a permanent system that will eventually cover the entire country.

Mr. THAYER. Is it not a good service?

Mr. BOUTELL. It is excellent.

Mr. THAYER. Can you better it by auctioning off this one department to the lowest bidder?

Mr. BOUTELL. We can in various ways——

Mr. THAYER. I doubt it.

Mr. BOUTELL. First, by absolutely equalizing the compensation and satisfying the men who do the work.

Mr. THAYER. Why should you equalize the compensation if in certain parts of the United States it can be done a great deal cheaper than in others, as was suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]; why should you not give a different salary to a man in Mississippi than you do to one in Ohio?

Mr. BOUTELL. Why, I answered a moment ago to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] that we are providing in this bill not for a service of 7,000 carriers, but for a service that we hope will extend to fifty or seventy-five thousand carriers in the future. I submit to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] whether it would not be simply impracticable to leave to the Department the adjustment of the salaries of 50,000 or 75,000 carriers. And would it not be difficult and well-nigh impossible to regulate these salaries so as to do equal justice to all?

Mr. THAYER. Not when carried out as faithfully and economically as it has been in the last four years.

Mr. BOUTELL. But we have no assurances that it is always to be administered by a Republican Administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. Sufficient unto the day will be the evil thereof.

Mr. KLUTTZ. You want to be sure that it will always be Republican in politics.

Mr. BOUTELL. Well, we want to be sure that this economy and efficiency will continue; perhaps that is the same thing.

Mr. Chairman, I see that my time is drawing to a close, and I close these few brief arguments in favor of the bill with one other suggestion. I base none of my arguments on the supposed political effects of one measure or another. So far as I am personally concerned, I have no fear of interference by any section of the people of the United States with the performance of our duty. I have no more fear of a letter carrier or a post-office clerk, and if I lived in the country, I should have no more fear of the rural carriers or of their sinister influence upon legislation, than I have of any other part of the community. In my opinion, they constitute a body of loyal, patriotic men, whose views and petitions are entitled to as much consideration as those of any other citizens.

So far as the political arguments are concerned they have very little weight, in my mind, in considering this measure. I think we can dismiss them with this simple observation, that as trustees and representatives of the people we can never depart one footstep from the straight road that the best interests of the public call upon us to faithfully follow without some time being called to account by our consciences, our constituents, or posterity, and perhaps by all three. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bill of the following title:

H. R. 3104. An act to grant the right of way through the Oklahoma Territory and the Indian Territory to the Enid and Anadarko Railway Company, and for other purposes.

RURAL FREE-DELIVERY SERVICE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, upon yesterday the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] used this language, which appears in the RECORD:

> My distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] and my eloquent friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] touched upon this vital subject yesterday seriously, and the latter spoke at great length. I regret that I shall not have time, nor do I feel physically able to-day, to reply fully to either, but I do think that both of the gentlemen have been misled, in that they have not had before them the recent rules and regulations which were promulgated February 1, 1902, and under which the rural system is now being executed.

In answer to that, Mr. Chairman, I will state that I published in full in the RECORD as an appendix to my remarks the document to which I had been referring, and from which I quoted, and which begins in this way:

> On February 1, 1902—
> Mark you—
> the order of the President classifying rural letter carriers will become effective. After that day vacancies occurring in the force of carriers will be filled in accordance with rules of the Civil Service Commission.
> The following special rules are prepared for the guidance of route inspectors, who will be detailed to conduct examinations where vacancies exist.

The very document itself shows that it was issued to take effect after February 1, 1902, and is the document under which they are now operating.

One word more, and I shall resume my seat. I did not call attention yesterday to the very worst feature of these instructions. I will read it now:

> 15. When a route inspector has doubts about an applicant's character or reputation he should not only make inquiry of two or three persons given as references in the application, but also consult two or more prominent citizens not mentioned by the applicant.

Why, the opportunity for partisan manipulation would not have been stronger if instead of the language:

> Also consult two or more prominent citizens not mentioned by the applicant.

It had said:

> He may also consult the Republican referee in a Democratic district, or the Republican Representative in a Republican district.

I thank the gentleman from California.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I should like to know what is the difference in the time?

The CHAIRMAN. One hour and twenty-five minutes more of time has been used by the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] than by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

Mr. SWANSON. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KLUTTZ].

Mr. KLUTTZ. Mr. Chairman, whether within the law, as I understand it, or whether without the law, as so earnestly contended by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL]; whether under a system, as would seem to be demonstrated by results, or whether without system, as contended by that gentleman, rural free-delivery service has come to stay. By its fruits it has demonstrated not only its usefulness but its indispensability. No improvement of the public service ever attempted by the Government has been so immediately, so rapidly, and so universally acceptable and successful.

It has done tardy justice to our great rural population; delivered the mails daily at the very homes of the farmers, put them in daily touch with the outer world; given them daily papers, market reports, weather signals, registered letters, postal orders, stamps, and packages by mail. It has made life on the farm more tolerable and more pleasant, and it has lightened the life of many a farmer's boy, relieved his solitude, saved him from the maelstrom of the city, and in doing so has lightened the declining years of many a fond and anxious father and mother. It is the first real effort ever made to put the farmer on something like an equal footing with his neighbors in the cities and towns, so far as the postal service is concerned.

And the correctness of the policy of delivering mail by the Government to the citizen at his home being admitted, why should not the dweller in rural communities be put upon an equality, as near as may be, with the dwellers in towns and cities? Is there any divinity which doth hedge about city and town people, which does not also extend to the people who live in the country and on the farms? Is there any reason why the Government should deliver mails from two to five times daily at city homes, which does not equally demand that such delivery should be made at least once daily, where practicable, at the home of a man, who, resisting the temptations of the town and city, prefers to remain on his own broad acres, away from the temptations, the snares, the smells, the confinement of the city?

Is the man who digs and delves in the soil, who rises early and works late every day in the year, whose work is never done, simply because he does not, can not, would not live in a town or city, entitled to less consideration in the matter of mail delivery than he who prefers the noise, the smells, the discomforts, the irreligion of the city? And should the question of economy arise any more in the one case than in the other? I trow not; and I want every member of this Congress who votes in favor of this bill to answer this question to his rural constituents when he goes home for reelection.

Is there any reason why the city carrier who works but eight hours a day, has all holidays, with annual leave, and who walks on asphalt pavements, should receive $800 to $1,000 a year, while the rural carrier, who must make his way of from 20 to 30 miles a day through the ice and snow, and over the bad roads of the interior, required to furnish bond for himself and a substitute, as well as horse and conveyance, should be grudged the $600 per annum allowed him under the present regulations? Let the gentlemen who vote for this bill answer to their rural constituents.

Is there any reason why a city carrier (at Kokomo, Ind., for instance) should receive $850 per annum, and an additional $240 per annum for horse and cart, and objection be made to paying a carrier in the rural districts, where roads are bad, requiring for most of the year two horses, $600 per annum?

Gentlemen may find some excuse for this seemingly inexcusable inconsistency. I hope they may be able to do so.

I do not understand any gentleman to contend that this service will be made more efficient by letting it to the lowest bidder. Even the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], in his desperate search for reasons for support of his bill, makes no such contention.

He bases his somewhat incoherent and inexplicable demand for so radical a change, if I rightly apprehend him, almost solely upon the alleged ground of economy. True, he professes to fear great danger to the ease, peace of mind, and reelection of Congressmen from the appointment of some thousands of intelligent men as rural carriers, and solemnly advises us to take our chances of permanency in Congress with a like number of underpaid, overworked, and unintelligent contractors. In his disturbed vision he sees with troubled glance a repetition of the raid of the tatterdemalions on Paris, and he hears in imagination the irresistible demands of a few thousand intelligent, civil-service-appointed carriers for reasonable remuneration.

If I understand the temper of this House, the gentleman will fail to impress it with his own pessimistic fears. Surely no member of Congress need fear an intelligent rural carrier, nor need 10 or 20 of them in a county strike consternation to the heart of any faithful Representative; rather, indeed, will the intelligence which they disseminate be his greatest shield and commendation.

The question for this House ought to be, not whether this service can be pared down to the lowest limit in cost, but rather, How can it be made more efficient? I grant that if it is to be crippled, relegated to a secondary place, to even the discredited star-route system—let to the lowest bidders and simply at the least cost, without regard to either acceptability or efficiency—there may be merit in the gentleman's bill. But if it is to maintain the enviable reputation which it has already made, if it is to fulfill its present promise, if it is to give the rural population the very best and promptest mail service, it must have no such friendly knock-out-drops administered to it. Indeed, I do not believe that under the proposed contract system an equally efficient service could be given for less than the present cost. Why is this radical change proposed? Whence does it originate? From whence comes the demand for it? Echo answers, Why, whence, and where?

The gentleman from California practically admits that the child was born in the room of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, without any particular demand from anybody anywhere. It was evolved, I take it, out of the inner consciousness of the gentleman from California after three months' incubation. The gentleman is by his own modest confession the father, or at least one of the twin fathers, of this system. It is his own precious offspring. For six years he has watched by its cradle and seen it grow from a puling infant to a very giant whose dimensions now appall him. He has seen it grow from a few experimental routes in 1896 to more than 7,000 in 1902, with a prospect of 9,000 by the middle of this year. He has waited to see its introduction, its administration, its operation hailed as a blessing by one-fourth of the rural population of the United States and anxiously awaited and prayed for by the remaining three-fourths.

All this time he has been chairman of the committee in charge of the service; he has reported and voted for appropriation after appropriation for its extension, and all at once he has awakened to the alarming fact that the present system is all wrong; that its administration has been extravagant, and that its only salvation is to cut it off close behind the ears and reduce it almost to a level with the star-route system.

In spite of all the abuse that has been heaped upon the administration of this service, I dare maintain that it has been marked by an intelligence unequaled in Department annals. I dare maintain that it has been a success beyond comparison with any hitherto attempted improvement in Government service.

As to efficiency of administration let the record speak.

There are some remarkable things about this bill, not so much in what it contains as in what it does not contain. The gentleman from California intimated that the report of the minority might have been written by some other gentleman than any one of the minority members, and that it might have been written by some literary gentleman; and I say that the internal evidence, upon the face of this bill and the report which accompanies it, is at least equally strong, that in this case the report might have been written by one gentleman and the bill by another.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] the other day contended that there was no such provision in the bill, nor contemplated by the bill, as that the law allowed either party to the contract, the Government or the contractor, to throw it up within thirty days; and he said if there was any such provision in the bill the Postmaster-General—let me give his exact language—

> Would be either a miserable fool or an amazing idiot to let it be done.

Now, I grant that it does not appear in the bill, but the chairman of the committee, in filing his report, says that that is what the bill means, and I gladly acquit the gentleman from California of either ignorance of the contents and intent of the bill or of any desire to deceive the House, because we all admire the gentleman from California for his sturdy integrity, and we would all love him if he would only allow us to do so, but the gentleman in the beginning of his remarks on this bill said truly that "it was as natural for him to oppose as it was for him to breathe." So that the chairman of the committee says that while it is not in the language of the bill as given it is the intent of the bill, and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, in conference with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], sustains that view. So that, taking the testimony of the chairman of the committee and of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, the gentleman from Mississippi, one of the ablest advocates of this bill, being the judge, it contains a provision which if executed would make the Postmaster-General "a miserable fool or an amazing idiot."

If that is true, then this bill ought to be defeated, or ought at least to be sent back to the committee and put in such shape as that this House can really understand it.

But coming now to the question of cost, the question of economy, I contend, as I did a while ago, that the question of economy should no more enter into this service than into the city delivery service; and I want to be frank. I have read the report and the estimates of the Postmaster-General. He estimates that by the 1st of July of this year 8,600 of these routes will be in operation, serving, as he estimates, one-fourth of the rural population. This multiplied by four gives a total number of routes necesary to supply the whole country at 34,400, which at $600 each would be $23,640,000.

This seems an enormous sum; but it is only about the cost of three battle ships, only about one-third of the amount of the river and harbor bill expected to pass this House annually; it is ten millions less than is paid the railroad companies for mail transportation; and yet because it goes to the farmer, because it is intended to relieve the tedium and solitude of country life, because it is for the benefit of the man who cultivates the soil, the question of economy is raised here, when appropriations for hundreds of millions of dollars go without question, and without even a member of this House voting either yea or nay; but when we come to this proposition, which proposes gradually to appropriate $23,640,000 for the benefit of the free rural delivery service, all at once gentlemen become virtuously economical and say that it will bankrupt the Government!

But it will not cost even that much. For the Postmaster-General says that on the routes already established the saving by the discontinuance of the star routes and fourth-class post-offices has already been about one-sixth of the entire appropriation which has been made for this service; and that in addition to that the increase of the revenues from these routes last year was from 8 to 10 per cent. So that the expense will not be as great as it would at first seem, and I believe in the end it will be justified, and that, finally, this system will be as near self-sustaining as any other branch of the postal service.

I am a believer in all proper economy upon all proper occasions and for all proper purposes, but I am opposed to a cheese-paring economy, which would prevent the development and evolution of the great benefits of this service to the rural population of our country. Gentlemen talk about politics. I was glad to hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL], somewhat jocularly, it is true, admit that the idea of this bill was that it would tend to perpetuate Republican control over this service, and I believe that while it was said jocularly there is more truth than jestin it.

I want gentlemen on this side of the House, especially those who say that this bill takes the system absolutely out of politics, to consider this. Why, gentlemen complain that there have been politics in the administration of this Department heretofore, and that there has been partiality shown as between different sections. That may be true, and the reason is not far to seek. Gentlemen on this side of the House know that they have been promised time and again that inspectors should be sent to their districts and routes established, and that those promises have been broken, and they have been broken because of the greed, because of the insistence, because of the influence and the power of influential members of this House and chairmen of great committees, from whom a single request was more powerful with subordinate officials of this Government than the most importunate demands of humble members of this House like myself and other gentlemen on this side.

How does it happen that the chairman of one of the great committees of this House has over a hundred of these routes in his district? How does it happen that another chairman has 20 of them? How does it happen that another member of one of the great committees has over a hundred of them? The reason is not far to seek. But take it out of politics and put it under civil service; make it independent of politics and outside the irresistible insistence of influential members of the House, and then we will have no further cause to complain on this score. [Loud applause.]

It has been intimated that gentlemen opposing this bill are influenced by favors received. Let me say that if any gentleman has cause for complaint, I have more. I have not a single clerk in that office; I have not a single appointee in that service, and I have as yet but one route in my district out of about sixty applications, though I have hope of quite a number being put into operation on the 1st of April. So this imputation can not lie against me.

I am opposing this bill for no such reason, but because I honestly believe that its adoption will be practically the death knell of this service, and that it will result in some sort of cross or hybrid arrangement between it and the star-route system.

I believe that when it is firmly protected by the provisions of the civil service it will be possible for every Representative from every State, without regard to party, to secure just and equal recognition, and not until then. If by actual trial it can be demonstrated that the contract system is best, then I shall cheerfully support that system; if it should be demonstrated that the work of the carrier can be efficiently done for less than $600, I shall favor such a reduction. What I object to now is the effort to tie this promising system, not yet out of the experimental stage, to an untried but absolutely cast-iron method of lowest bids. It will be time enough to do this when experiment and experience shall have demonstrated the wisdom of such a policy.

Mr. LACEY. May I ask the gentleman——

Mr. KLUTTZ. I have but a few minutes.

Mr. LACEY. I will ask to have the gentleman's time extended if necessary, and meanwhile I would like to ask——

Mr. KLUTTZ. When I get through I shall be glad to answer the gentleman, if I can have my time extended.

Now, Mr. Chairman, an effort has been made to inject politics into this discussion and to frighten gentlemen on this side into support of this bill by the alleged dire results of a continuance of the present regulations. Surely this is only the absence of legitimate argument. Gentlemen forget that this bill leaves absolutely to the Postmaster-General in the ultimate the selection of the contractor, with the right to reject any and all bids and to arbitrarily appoint whomsoever he chooses.

From whom, pray, will he get his information as to the proper person to be named? Will it not be from the local Republican postmasters and referees? And who, think you, will they name? Will it ever be a Democrat when a Republican is available? Nay, verily. Advocates of this bill, afraid to trust the Postmaster-General with the proper execution of the civil-service regulations, which, with the approval of the Civil Service Commissioners, he has himself promulgated, are yet willing to lodge in his hands the vastly greater power conferred by the bill.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has made merry over these civil-service regulations, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] seemed to enjoy pronouncing them a miserable farce.

Now, I am no ardent admirer of the Civil Service Commission, but I want to say that this is the most sensible examination which it has ever sanctioned or prescribed. It is exactly suited to test the fitness of the applicant for the duties of his position, his acceptability to the patrons of the route, and his ability to equip himself for the proper discharge of his work. There are no irrelevant or impracticable questions. The gentlemen, however, complain that the inspector may, or, as they say, must, inquire of two disinterested citizens, not referred to by the applicant, as to his character and fitness.

Would they have him confined in his inquiries to persons selected by the applicant? A stranger, unacquainted with the applicant or his referees, is it not wise that he should thus extend his inquiries?

Is it not wise, too, that, other things being equal, the nominee of a majority of the patrons of the route should be selected? If captious Southern Democrats would only read between the lines they would see the wisdom and necessity of these much-derided provisions as applicable to their own districts.

I would like for gentlemen to tell me, too, why the contractor will have less time or disposition to talk politics than the rural carrier, or why he will be less obnoxiously influential in doing so.

Just another question: Can the rural carrier, who must hustle to get over his route, and who can have little time to talk politics to any of the hundred or more families whose homes he daily passes, be more objectionable politically than the Republican fourth-class postmaster, who sits all day in his office or store, with ample time to talk politics and distribute political literature to all comers? But I have not time to pursue the subject further. For the reasons thus hurriedly given, as well as for many others which I could adduce did time permit, I trust, Mr. Chairman, that in the interest of the public service this bill may be overwhelmingly defeated.

Mr. SWANSON. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF].

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I am exceedingly sorry to notice more or less imputations against the officials who have been instituting and operating the rural free-delivery system through the Post-Office Department. The popularity of the system and the failure to present any serious criticism of its operation in the country is sufficient reply to any animadversions against the Post-Office Department. It must be remembered that it was not a beaten path to be pursued, that it was not a simple prosecution of work already laid out, but the work involved the installation of routes in the different States and the systemizing of the work in the Post-Office Department and involved the laying of the foundation of a great work, and instead of criticism great credit is due to the First Assistant Postmaster-General and his predecessor and his superintendent of free delivery, Mr. Machen.

Neither do I entertain any sympathy with the criticisms of the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I concern myself with nothing except the merits of the question before us. The fact that the chairman of that committee differs with me does not interfere with my high opinion of his integrity and ability. I also appreciate the gravity of this question. We are laying the foundation for a great work, which will undoubtedly involve great expenditure of money, but which I confidently hope and believe will yield even larger returns to the country and an increased revenue to the Post-Office Department. But it must not be forgotten that this Department is not operated for profit but is operated for the benefit of the people of the country and the commerce of the country, and as a great medium of education. We are informed by the Post-Office Department that in six years it will take some 45,000 or 50,000 carriers for universal free delivery—rural delivery throughout the country—and that means the expenditure of some $30,000,000, besides other expenses of administration.

Mr. Chairman, I have the honor of coming from a district in Illinois and representing it now for eight years which was formerly Democratic. Therefore if any man on this floor would be moved by political considerations in his vote it certainly ought to be myself. But my brief political experience has taught me that if a man depends upon the influence growing out of the few appointments that he may be able to control in his district, and devotes the greater part of his time to serving the interests of the people of his district in that direction, and does not permit himself to take a larger view of the political questions that come before us in this Hall, then he misses his own interests and does not take a proper conception of his duties here.

So far as political interests are concerned, however, they may interest gentlemen who seek to succeed themselves. I do not care whether these rural carriers are placed under the contract system or whether they are employed in the way in which they are now.

It seems to me that that is of decidedly little importance. I do not believe that the political fortunes of members of Congress hang upon the question whether or not we are going to employ forty or fifty thousand rural carriers, scattered all over the United States, mind you, so that their influence, whatever it may be, is minimized by that fact.

I do not believe any such thing. But I do believe that the people of your district and mine are interested in those public questions which affect the people as a whole, and I do believe that the making of this experimental rural delivery a permanent system is an important question and has a weighty bearing upon everyone who may be called upon to vote on it. And, in that connection, I am in favor of this bill, because I believe that is the important feature of it.

But, as I understand, those who are opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from California to depart from the past custom in reference to the employing of these rural carriers under the Post-Office Department—those who are opposed to the system of letting by bids this service—propose to amend the bill by striking out that portion pertaining to the letting of this service by contract and to substitute therefor the proposition that these rural carriers shall continue to be employed, as they now are, under civil-service rules as made by the Civil Service Commission and as covered by the order of the President of the United States, at a salary not exceeding $600 per annum.

Now, gentlemen, has anyone heard any complaint as to the efficiency of this work as performed under the present system? There certainly ought to be presented in the beginning, if you propose to change the existing system, a reason founded on some want of efficiency or some needless expense growing out of the operation of the present system. What do we find? We are greeted right in the beginning with the admission of the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] that $600, the maximum amount which we who oppose him propose to insert in the bill, is a fair and reasonable compensation for the service. What is the reason given for the departure?

Why, sir, because there is going to be a great army of political employees who are going to affect the political fortunes of the candidates for Congress in the several districts. Is there anything different about this threatened danger in the present case from the old danger that has been threatening members of Congress from the foundation of the Government? No, sir. Is there any more reason in this case than in any other why we should depart from the usual method of employing the appointees under the Government? No; no substantial reason is furnished.

The nearest approach to a reason that we had in the two hours' speech of the gentleman from California was that there had been a change in the star-route contract system by which the carriers on a star route, as it was claimed by the gentleman from California, were doing substantially what we desire the rural carrier to do. Now, I asked the gentleman from California, in the course of his speech—and the question appears in the RECORD with his answer—if it were true that the carrier under a star-route contract is compelled to collect letters along the route. I read from the RECORD of the day before yesterday:

Mr. GRAFF. Does the gentleman mean to say that these recent contracts—and I want to say to the gentleman that I am somewhat familiar with them—contain a provision that the star-route carrier can deliver and collect mail?
Mr. LOUD. Not that he can, but that he must.
Mr. GRAFF. You say it is obligatory?
Mr. LOUD. That is his contract; yes.
Mr. BATES. Not to collect mail?
Mr. LOUD. To collect mail. I stand by what I said at first, to deliver and collect mail, and do everything——

Now, let us see if that is true or not. I made a visit to the Post-Office Department for the purpose of finding out whether my information obtained several months ago—not with a view to this debate—was correct or not. And what do we find? I find on page 318 of the annual report of the Postmaster-General for the year 1901 the following:

The carrier—

That is, the carrier on these star-route contracts—

is not required to collect mail from the boxes, but there is no objection to his doing so if it does not interfere with his making the schedule time.

Mr. MAHON. And the man to whom he delivers the mail must take the risk?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes; and yet the star-route system in the contract, under the delivery of the entire mail by the sack, are permitted to perform certain duties with reference to the delivery of the mail; they are not obliged to deliver the mail to the patrons upon the route until when? Until each particular patron of that road who desires to be served goes to the post-office out of which that route runs and presents an order to the postmaster there asking, in writing, and authorizing and directing that the carrier under that star-route contract shall deliver that mail.

Mr. LOUD. Why does not the gentleman bring in the contract? Does not this contractor agree to deliver the mail to any and every person along his route?

Mr. GRAFF. I have not the contract in my possession.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman had better get it and read it.

Mr. GRAFF. I suppose the report of the Postmaster-General is correct in that respect, and I understand that is the practice of the Department. Now, if it is true—and I was informed this morning at the Post-Office Department that it was true—that each patron that desires to be served is to give an order to the postmaster to have the mail delivered him, whose agent is the carrier of that mail? He is the agent of the patrons of the route. He becomes the agent of the patrons of the route when he is carrying that mail under the authority conferred upon him by the written order of the patrons of that office. Under these circumstances, if any loss of mail occurs, if any negligence arises in the delivery of that mail under that order which constituted the carrier under that star route the agent of the patrons, to whom is he liable?

Mr. LOUD. To whom is he liable in the other instance? Where is his remedy, and where is his relief? Suppose the rural carrier loses or steals his mail, where is the patron's remedy?

Mr. GRAFF. The patron's remedy is the same as it would be in any other case of negligence to the Government. Of course he could not sue the Government. He would simply have to file his claim in some proper department. If he desires to sue the Government he has to have a special permission. But there is a great deal of difference when a carrier is the agent of the Government and when he is the agent of the patrons.

Mr. LOUD. Not a particle, except that you can sue the contractor.

Mr. GRAFF. When he is the agent of the Government, the Government will live up to its obligations and see how its agents perform its duties.

Mr. LOUD. The patron can sue his agent, and he can not sue the Government's agent. There is another statement which the gentleman made that I want to correct, and then I will interrupt him no further.

Mr. GRAFF. I do not object to the interruption, only I have but about three minutes remaining.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman does not want to be unfair?

Mr. GRAFF. Oh, no.

Mr. LOUD. I did not say that they were compelled to take the mail out of the boxes, but that the contractor enters into a contract to take the mail that is given to him. That is what I said.

Mr. GRAFF. I quoted from the RECORD.

Mr. LOUD. But the gentleman should read a little more of the RECORD.

Mr. GRAFF. I do not want to put the gentleman from California in the attitude of stating an untruth, because I know he would not.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman knows I did not.

Mr. GRAFF. I do not know whether the gentleman did or not, but I know he would not willingly state an untruth, because I have the greatest confidence in the honesty and integrity of the gentleman from California, and I have no sympathy with the attacks made upon his motives. I believe he is one of the most valuable members on the floor of this House.

Mr. LOUD. But the gentleman is taking a part of my remarks and putting me in the position of stating a falsehood on the floor of the House, which I did not do.

Mr. GRAFF. No; if the gentleman from California said that he qualified his statement afterwards——

Mr. LOUD. I did not qualify the statement any further than this, and I say again, that the carrier is compelled to collect the mail. I did not say that he was compelled to take it out of the box.

Mr. GRAFF. Well, we will both admit that is true, and if it is true it is a very strong argument in favor of the rural carriers instead of the star-route carriers, who are not compelled to take the mail from the box. The farmers of the community would rather have carriers who are compelled to take the mail out of the box and to deliver it. So, if we are to have this, it is strengthened by the admission of the gentleman from California that these rural carriers under the star-route contract are only compelled to take the mail that is handed to them.

There is something else in connection with that. If some one along the route hands a letter to that star-route mail carrier, that carrier can not deliver that letter to the party to whom it is addressed along that route until he has taken it to the post-office and had it stamped in the post-office.

Mr. LOUD. Now, one moment, and I will stop. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman in his argument, but the gentleman can not strengthen his argument by attempting to disprove a statement which I made yesterday, and which I reiterate to-day, and which is true, and the gentleman has not disproved it.

Mr. GRAFF. I do not seek to disprove what the gentleman has said. I simply seek to make a statement of a fact which the gentleman admits.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman will read his remarks to-morrow

he will find that he has put me in the position of telling a falsehood to this House, and I do not think the gentleman will now say that I did.

Mr. GRAFF. No; I did not say you did, and I do not think you did.

Mr. LOUD. That is all I care about.

Mr. GRAFF. But the gentleman did say in his remarks the day before yesterday that in connection with registered letters, all that the rural carrier under the salary system did with the registered letters was to take a receipt therefor, and he certainly left the impression upon the House that his duties in connection with registered letters were far different from the duties of a postmaster with registered letters.

Now, then, I will say to the gentleman and to the House that I have here upon the desk a book which is carried by the rural carrier for the purpose of entering registered mail upon it; that blanks are furnished him and in that blank book is contained a receipt which he gives to the party sending out the registered letter or package; that in that same blank book is a receipt which he takes to the post-office out of which the route runs and hands the registered letter to the postmaster and receives the receipt of the postmaster written in the same book of the carrier; that in addition to that he is armed with this book which I now show to the House, upon which he enters the receipt of these registered letters and keeps a perfect record of them. Now, then, a railway mail carrier performing service upon the railroads of the country receives in the course of his business——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAFF. I would like to have a little more time, if I can.

Mr. LOUD. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. GRAFF. I am much obliged to you. I say the railway mail carrier receives in the course of his business a registered letter, and what does he do? He takes it to the post-office of the addressee and obtains a receipt from the postmaster at the post-office out of which the addressee gets his mail. That is exactly the duty performed with regard to these rural carriers.

Are the gentlemen under the star-route contracts authorized to receive registered letters and perform any such duties? No. It is obligatory upon these rural carriers to perform that service. How much of that service have they performed? I hold in my hand here a statement showing the number of registered letters delivered and collected and also the money-order applications received by carriers in the rural free-delivery service during the month of December, 1901. It is as follows:

Registered letters and packages, in one month	14,900
Letters and packages registered on the route	11,964
Applications for money orders on the route, in one month	56,973

Now, let us say that those money orders average only $2 each, and they would aggregate in a month $113,946 for one month, or $1,367,352 per year, for 6,000 carriers on December 1, or about ten orders per month per carrier. Now, if this system is extended to 45,000 or 50,000 carriers it will lessen the expense of the Post-Office Department with reference to very small offices, and it will, in addition to that, be calculated to stimulate the amount of business which the people do through the medium of the Post-Office Department. It must not be thought that because there is over a hundred million dollars carried in the Post-Office appropriation bill that that amount is appropriated out of the United States Treasury without receiving any credit from the earnings of the Post-Office Department.

For the year ending June 30, 1901, there was received by the Post-Office Department $111,631,193.39; but of that amount only $4,954,762.21 was paid out of the United States Treasury, in fact. During that same year there was an increase in the receipts of the Post-Office Department, in 1901 over 1900, of more than $9,000,000; and the deficiency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, was estimated some three or four months ago by the Post-Office Department as being nothing; in other words, that the actual receipts of the Post-Office Department were equal to its expenditures.

It must be remembered also that in this report presented by the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] in favor of this bidding system, a statement is made of the fact that the sum of $17,000,000 was expended during the past year for city free delivery. Does anyone say that the city free delivery has not expedited the business of the country? It has swelled the receipts of the Post-Office Department, but that is a comparatively unimportant matter when we consider its effects in facilitating the business of the country.

So I say that I am not alarmed by facing this question. We have the same problems to face with reference to the raising of salaries in other departments of the Government. There is nothing peculiar about this condition which demands a radical departure from the usual system of making the appointments, and it would destroy the efficiency which confessedly exists under the present system. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HITT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 10847. An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate has passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 27.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 7,500 additional copies of Senate Document No. 164, third session, Fifty-fifth Congress, being the report of the Daughters of the American Revolution for 1890 to 1897, together with the historical preface herewith, indorsed by the board of management of that society, of which 2,500 shall be for the use of the Senate and 5,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

RURAL FREE-DELIVERY SERVICE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SWANSON. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for putting the rural-delivery carriers under the contract system and for letting out the routes to the lowest bidder, like the system now in effect in the management of the star routes, and would in a short time bring this system down to the inefficient level of the unsatisfactory and discredited and often unreliable and always poorly paid star-route service. Since I have had an opportunity to investigate the subject of rural free delivery I have been an earnest advocate of the system, and during this past summer I took occasion to visit several different parts of my district and explain to the people, as far as I possibly could, the workings of it and bring it to their attention in order that they might have the benefit of it if they desired it.

I simply state this in the outset of the remarks which I expect to make upon this occasion to show that I feel a great interest in this service; and if I could be convinced that the plan proposed by this bill was in the interest and for the welfare of the service and for the good of the people, nobody would vote for it more cheerfully than I would. But the more I have studied it and the further I have investigated it, the more fully I have been convinced that if carried into effect it will tend to destroy the service rather than to build it up, and for that reason I can not possibly lend to it my aid or assistance.

The gentleman who addressed the House a few moments ago, my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL], said that he wanted to disabuse the minds of those who were opposing this bill of the idea that those who were in favor of it were opposed to the system of rural free delivery, but that, as a matter of fact, they had uniformly advocated and supported it and voted for appropriations in its interest. If that be true, then I appeal to them not to turn around and seek to destroy their heretofore good work by putting into this service something that, it seems to me, strikes at the very root of it and brings it down to the level of the star routes that have brought discredit and discomfort upon the country; but they should let it pursue the even tenor of its way upon which it has already started and seek to have it attain greater success, if possible, than it has attained up to the present time.

Not a single objection from any part of this country has come up in opposition to this service. Nobody is demanding any change, except the committee which brought this bill into the House, and my experience and observation is that whenever you give anything to the people, no matter what it may be, that is not satisfactory to them, they will let you hear from them, and they will make known their objections and request the correction of the defects that exist in it. When you have a service that extends throughout the country, and when no single objection from any source or from anywhere or from any citizen has been heard against that service, we must believe that it is giving universal satisfaction; and in my judgment it is best to let a service alone when it is giving perfect satisfaction to the people, because, sometimes at least, it is a good idea to follow that good old adage which tells us "to let well enough alone," and especially is that true when it is accomplishing the purpose and the intention for which it was inaugurated, and satisfying the country people for whom it is intended. [Applause.]

I say that the service has developed and given eminent satisfaction from the very day that it was put into existence, under a Democratic Administration, by a Democratic Postmaster-General, up to the present time, and that all the cries that have been made against it in reference to its possible cost have been put to naught by reason of the fact that everywhere it has been inaugurated it has brought an increase in revenues; it has brought an increase in letter-writing; it has added to the receipts of the Government, and is rapidly paying its own way, and my judgment is that as it increases more throughout the country, as it goes further, it will increase the revenues more, and instead of being a burden to the Government it will be a profit to the Government, just exactly as the free-delivery service in the cities is a source of net revenue to the Government to-day and is paying its own way and a profit.

In 1863, when it was proposed to give the free-delivery service to the city, this same cry that it would cost too much was made against that service, as you will see if you read the debates at that time and the objections offered to that service then. But instead of being an expense to the Government, instead of being a burden to the Government, it is to-day a source of net revenue. I say that when we are spending about $20,000,000 a year, giving free delivery to the people in 866 cities, it is nothing but just and right to give to the people in the country the same service, as far as it is possible to do so, that we are giving to the people in the cities. I would not, if I could to-day, take away from the city people and the town people the advantages they have, but God knows I would be further from taking away from the country people any advantages or opportunities which they have. They get less, in my judgment, from the Government than any class of people we have to-day. They bear more of the burdens; they contribute more of the revenue, and they pay more of the expenses than any other class of people we have in all our broad land, and still get less direct benefit from it than any class of people we have. Instead of doing that which would decrease their pleasures and their happiness and their joys, I would add to their pleasure, their happiness, and their joys if it were possible for me to do so. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, this system is calculated to bring to them advantages which they have not had previous to its inauguration. Then, when there are about 35,000,000 people having free delivery in the cities, and about 32,000,000 people—so says the Post-Office Department—to whom we can carry rural delivery in the country at an expense not exceeding that which is paid for free delivery in the 866 cities having free delivery, I want to ask this House by what rule of right or justice or equity you propose in this way to cripple the service given to the people in the country? Will you practically take away from them the service which has been inaugurated and started on its career and still continue the efficient service to the people in the cities who have enjoyed it through all the years and to the support of which the country people have since 1863 contributed by the payment of their taxes and by their contributions to the revenues of the Government? I can not see where the justice is in doing that.

Without the country people the Government could not be run, because if it were not for them we would have no factories, no railroads; we would have no steamboats; we would have no commerce, no trade either within our own land or with other lands; because they are the ones who from the ground dig out the substance that furnishes the raw materials and the means with which the factories are run, with which the commerce is carried on, and with which the railroads and steamboat lines are operated; with which not only our internal commerce is built up, but foreign commerce is acquired; and to them we must look, and to them I say I would give every advantage that it is possible for us to give to them. They are the bed rock and the foundation of this Government, and every material interest is upheld by them. [Applause.]

Shall we turn our backs upon the history of the country for a century in reference to the employment of its people? For more than a hundred years, wherever personal fitness, individual integrity, and moral character have been required by the Government in employees, the salary system has prevailed. In no part of this Government, in no department of it, is there a single employee where personal fitness, personal integrity, personal character, and individual responsibility are required is the service let out to the lowest bidder. The distinction between mails carried by contract and those where you have the salaried employees is this: That those carried by contract are all carried in bulk, and not a single one but what is carried in bulk. But where there are individual fitness and individual services to be required, then the salary system has always prevailed; and that has been the uniform custom, the uniform rule, and the uniform law that have been pursued in this Government for a century. Where mail is transported in bulk, as on the star routes, the efficiency of the service does not depend on the individual efficiency of the employee, but on the solvency of the contractor and the physical ability of the employee to safely deliver a mail sack containing the mail which has been delivered to him at one point to be carried to another point. Where each piece of mail is to be handled by the employee, then individual efficiency and character is the question to be considered, and character can not be guaranteed by contract. The lowest bid is a numerical matter. Character is not. Either higher bids will be taken, in which case there will be no economy, or lower bids will be accepted, and the efficiency of this service will be destroyed. Let us flee from either result by maintaining the system as it is now being conducted. Will you turn your backs upon the experience of a century and seek that of which you know not and go into the unknown field where you can not tell what the result will be. A principle of postal administration adhered to for over a century, and by such long experience proven to be the safest and the best, should not, in my judgment, be so ruthlessly and suddenly deserted and overturned, as is proposed to be done by the passage of this bill.

Now, then, I regret to differ with my friend and distinguished colleague from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] in reference to any great question. I am always loath to take a position differing from that which he advocates, because I have the greatest admiration for him—yea, I would say, affection for him—but I am obliged on this occasion to take a different view of this subject; and I am surprised to see how much force, how much effect, he sought to place on the little rules that were promulgated by the Department in carrying out this system, when he advocates this bill which provides on its very face that, although a man may bid the lowest price, still he can not obtain the contract unless the Postmaster-General says so, for it gives the Postmaster-General absolute veto power.

What is required under this bill? First, the man who applies for the contract must be the lowest bidder; second, he must convince the Postmaster-General, to his satisfaction, that he is a legal and actual resident of the route; third, that he is reliable and trustworthy and of good moral character; fourth, that he is able to read and write and has sufficient intelligence and ability to perform properly the service, and lastly, he must furnish a sufficient guaranty that he will do so. These are the qualifications and requirements. Now, when a man does all that, we would believe, according to the argument of my friend, that he would certainly get the contract; that the bidder who complies with these requirements might justly say, "I have complied with all these requirements, and therefore I demand, as a matter of right, that you give me the contract." But no such thing occurs. My friend did not read the next provision of the bill, where it says:

But the Postmaster-General may reject all proposals submitted under any advertisement.

This bill makes the Postmaster-General the absolute and only judge of all these matters, and even goes so far as to allow him to deny a man the contract even though he had complied with every requirement and condition.

No matter what the bid may be, no matter what the guaranties may be, no matter what the proof as to character may be, no matter what the circumstances may be, the bidder complying with all these requirements does not necessarily get the contract. The Postmaster-General may say, as was urged by my distinguished friend in reference to inspectors, "I do not like the build of the fellow, or the expression of his face, or the color of his hair," or he may make some other objection to him; or, without specifying any objection at all, he could simply say to the bidder, "I do not like you, sir, and although you have complied with every requirement specified in the law, you can not have the contract." That would be or could be the result of the operation of this bill.

Now, I want to call attention to another thing. These rules which the gentleman read for the carrying out of this service were made under the authority of a Postmaster-General in office or of some appointee in the Post-Office Department. Now, if one Postmaster-General can make rules as ridiculous as the gentleman would have us believe these to be, could not another Postmaster-General do identically the same thing? What has been done by or under one Postmaster-General could be done by or under another Postmaster-General.

Besides, the Postmaster-General must have knowledge in regard to all these things which are here specified. He must know that the man is reliable and trustworthy; that he is a man of good moral character, etc. Now, how will he find out these things? Why, sir, I presume he will send some representative of the Department—a post-office inspector or some other officer—who will go down to the locality and investigate, under such rules, regulations, and instructions as he may make, and then come back and report the results of his investigation. This officer may report as to one man that he does not like him, or as to another that he does like him, or the Postmaster-General, after a favorable report upon an applicant for the contract, may, without any reason or excuse, say "I do not like this man; I will not employ him; I will turn him down; I decline to let him have the contract." I repeat, if these rules were made by or under the authority of one Postmaster-General, similar rules may be made by another, and especially so when the Postmaster-General has the whole matter in his power or under his thumb, when it is in his discretion to do as he pleases, giving an account to no living man. [Applause.]

As was argued yesterday by my distinguished friend from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], there is under the civil-service rules some opportunity for investigation, where everything is taken down in writing and it can be submitted to the inspector and to the board or to the Postmaster-General or to the Civil-Service Commission itself. Thus there are at least three opportunities, as the gentleman from Tennessee stated yesterday, for the applicant to have a hearing, whereas under the operation of this bill there would be no such opportunity given. The Postmaster-General, encircled with his official robe, could smile at the applicant and say to anyone who might urge the appointment of an applicant who had complied with all the requirements, "It is true you want his appointment; it is true he has complied with these requirements; but for reasons satisfactory to me, and which I do not have to give to you, he can not have the contract." And that would be a complete and everlasting end to the whole matter. Nobody could question the decision or bring it in review before any other official or any other tribunal. [Applause.]

Now, I want to call attention to another very important consideration affecting this question. What is the rural carrier? He is nothing more and nothing less than a traveling postmaster—passing through the community along the route under the direction and authority of the Post-Office Department—delivering and collecting mail, selling stamps, registering letters, purchasing money orders. The boxes along the route are the people's post-office. He collects the letters deposited there, and he delivers the ones intrusted to his care for the people along his route, sell stamps, etc.

Now, I say the rural carrier stands in a close relationship with the people along the route. They are greatly interested in the question of who shall be appointed. This rural carrier comes in contact with the families of the residents along the route. He is in daily association, far from the officers of the law and all legal protection, with the wives and children of the residents—those who are nearer and dearer to the men of the community than any other persons under the canopy of heaven. They are vitally interested in knowing who and of what character he is. Under the present system, the patrons of the route are permitted to nominate to the Post-Office Department the person they desire appointed carrier, and if, in a competitive examination, the person so nominated shows himself competent for the place, as a rule, he is appointed. Is that not fair, is it not home rule, is it not democratic—giving the patrons along the route the right to name the carrier, provided he is competent to discharge the duties required?

Under this bill they would have to take as carrier the man who bid the lowest, although he might be very offensive and distasteful to them. As for me, I prefer that my people shall have a voice in the selection of their own carrier, and I am willing, and they are willing, for the Government to pay him, when they participate in his selection, a reasonable and fair salary for his services. You let this service out to the lowest bidder, and it will speedily retrograde to the level of the unsatisfactory "star-route" system. Then its efficiency will soon be destroyed. It is amazing to me that these inexplainable fits for economy always burst upon us when something in the interest of the plain people—the masses of the people—is being considered. [Applause.]

You never hear of it when the interest of the trust, the monopolies, and the favored few is being considered. If this House is anxious really to practice some genuine economy there are thousands of better places to begin on than on this, the only governmental service, specially designed and intended for our country people. Permit me to call your attention to the fact that there are 28,000 men in the city delivery system and mail clerks on the train, all receiving an average salary of about $1,000 per year, entailing an expense to the Government of about $28,000,000 each year, while there are only six or eight thousand people in the rural service, costing the Government about $4,000,000 per year.

The rural carriers go through the open weather, the sleet and snow, as well as the sunshine, over the country roads, and the highest salary paid is $600 per year for man, mail vehicle, and equipment, all combined, while the city carrier, in his handsome uniform, decorated with brass buttons, travels over the paved and comfortable streets of the city for only eight hours, and has horse and wagon furnished him at the expense of the Government, and gets from six hundred to eleven hundred dollars per year; and the railway mail clerks have their well-heated and well-ventilated railroad car to travel and work in, and get from $800 to $1,400 per year, and still the advocates of this bill are suddenly seized with an irrepressible desire, with no demand from any source for it, to practice economy on rural carriers and on this beneficent system provided for the farmers, and nothing is said about these others who have these "soft snaps," to use a common expression. [Applause.]

In this very Capitol building and in every Government building in this beautiful capital city there are great numbers of employees, and, in my judgment, many unnecessary employees, getting much larger salaries for far less labor than the rural carrier, and they are right here before your eyes, and nothing is said about them, and no economy is proposed in their cases. There are 9,182 postal clerks employed under the Government, which cost the Government $7,675,436.72. How are they appointed? They stand a competitive examination, and I have no objection to that; but there are at least ten men who show themselves competent by this examination to fill the place which is open to appointment.

Now, if you are going to adopt this system of bidding be consistent and fair and require these men who are qualified to bid for the place to bid for it, and then award the position to the lowest bidder, and then carry your plan to its logical and legitimate conclusion and let the post-offices and the positions in the various departments out to the lowest bidder, and you will see what a "sweet and inviting situation" you will have. Would not that be a fine way to carry on the business of the Government? What would you think of a farmer letting out positions on his farm to the lowest bidder, of a merchant letting out the clerkships in his store to the lowest bidder, a railroad letting out its positions to the lowest bidder, or any private business enterprise pursuing that course? You will, I am sure, join me in saying such a course would be destruction and folly. Well, why then will you let these rural-carrier places to the lowest bidder? Do you not know it will necessarily destroy its efficiency and bring the service into disrepute. Instead of trying to ruin and destroy the system, as I believe would be the result of the passage of this bill, I would rather see the advocates of this bill doing something to build it up and to strengthen it and to extend it more rapidly to the people.

I would much prefer seeing you advocating a bill to make it beyond question by legislative enactment a fixed and permanent system and not leave it to the will of each Congress and dependent upon a provision in a mere appropriation bill, and I would be glad to see a provision put into such a law making the system permanent, providing for furnishing the people along these routes with boxes at the expense of the Government and free of cost to the patrons. But you say that would not be right. Why would it not? As I have said above, the rural carrier is a traveling postmaster, and the boxes along the routes is the post-office. Now, you know in the larger towns and cities the Government either owns and furnishes, or rents and furnishes, the post-office building and post-office fixtures.

Now, if that is right, why not furnish the country people the boxes—which on every route is the post-office—free of charge to the people? What I am pleading for is not to take any of the necessary conveniences away from the towns and cities, but to be just as kind and considerate of the country people as we are of the town and city people. Let us have no favorites, but rise above favoritism and treat all alike, and "give equal rights to all and special privileges to none." The Government does furnish the post-office buildings in the towns and cities. Now let these rural boxes be furnished free to the people, and that will even up matters, at least to some extent. Now, I believe in economy, and I am opposed to any and all extravagance, and if I could I would put a speedy end to a great deal of extravagance which I have seen the short time I have been in Washington, and I will join you any time in weeding out extravagance wherever it is found; but I am opposed to this spasmodic fit of so-called economy, which, in my judgment, would result in no genuine and beneficial economy, but would result in making the rural service so inefficient as to practically destroy its usefulness and beneficent results. [Applause.]

Congress has started a good work in giving this service to the country people; they deserve it, and ought to have had it long ago, and I do not believe it wise or prudent just as it is demonstrating its efficiency by the workings of the present system to "put on the brakes and reverse the engine," and start it in directly an opposite direction from the smooth and unobjectionable pathway it has been traveling so satisfactorily. The question for this House should not be how stingy and cheap can we run this service for the farmers, but it should be how can we, with reasonable, fair, and honest cost, make it more efficient and extend it to every home, no matter how humble, in this broad and beautiful country of ours.

I do not know how long I will remain a member of this House, but I am a candidate for reelection and expect to be here a while longer, anyway, and so long as I do remain here, looking to the great God above to guide me in the right, I shall to the utmost of my ability, by my vote and influence, deal out even-handed justice to all people alike, because I believe "public office is a public trust," and in the discharge of the duties thereof every citizen should receive equal consideration with every other citizen, and that the farmer in his humble log-cabin home should command and receive our candid consideration and faithful service as quickly as the rich man in his mansion, or the President in the White House, and, entertaining these views, so long as I am a member of this House I shall with pleasure vote for everything to build up the rural free-delivery service, and against everything hurtful to it, and believing this bill hurtful to it in many ways I shall vote against it, and I appeal to this House to bury it so deep that it will never be resurrected. Mr. Chairman, I will append some extracts showing how rural free delivery may be obtained by the people, and with my sincere thanks to the House for the very close attention they have given me I conclude, expressing the hope that this bill will be defeated. I will append extracts showing how to obtain the service. [Great applause.]

The extracts referred to are as follows:

HOW TO OBTAIN RURAL FREE DELIVERY.

Present a petition, addressed to the First Assistant Postmaster-General, Rural Free Delivery Division. This petition should be signed only by heads of families, and should mention the number in each family over 16 years of age. It should set forth the nature of the country where the delivery is desired, whether densely or sparsely populated, the principal occupations of the people, the character of the roads, and the distances which, under existing conditions, each person has to travel to receive his mail, and should be accompanied by a map or plat indicating the route or routes proposed.

The petition should read something like this:

[Form of petition.]

To the FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned heads of families, residing in —— County, State of ——, respectfully ask that the rural free-delivery service be extended to them, the delivery to start from —— post-office, —— County, —— State, or such other point as the officers of the Department may deem best adapted for the service. A map or rough sketch of the proposed route is herewith inclosed. Your petitioners are mostly (here state occupations, such as farmers, truck gardeners, dairymen, cattle raisers, or whatever the chief occupation of the people may be). The roads over the proposed route are (state whether pike, graveled, or otherwise).

There are no unbridged creeks, and the roads are passable at all seasons of the year.

We agree to conform to the official regulations governing the service and to erect boxes which have been approved by the Department for the reception of our mail.

* * * * * * *

This petition, when properly signed, should be sent to the Representative in Congress, or to one of the Senators, with a request that he indorse thereon his recommendation of the service asked and forward the petition to the Department.

* * * * * * *

The route should be so arranged that the carrier will not be required to travel over the same ground twice on the same day.

Those desiring the delivery must hereafter be prepared to put up, at their own expense, appropriate and secure boxes in accordance with the orders of the Department.

The prices of these boxes range from $1 up to a little over $3; locks, 25 cents; $1.25 will secure a good box with lock.

When a rural free-delivery route has been equipped with boxes of the above-named description the Department will consider these boxes as entitled to the protection of the United States Statutes, which provide severe penalties for willful or malicious injury to or interference with the contents of any receptacles for the United States mails established by authority of the Postmaster-General.

HOW SERVICE IS ESTABLISHED.

Upon receipt of a petition, favorably indorsed by a Representative in Congress, the Department refers the papers to the special agent in charge of the division which includes the State in which the petition originates. He assigns a special agent to visit the location indicated, to lay out a route or routes, and to select rural carriers, to be appointed by the Department.

Mr. SWANSON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PEARRE].

[Mr. PEARRE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all members who speak may have permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all members who speak may have permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal done by the Government and the Post-Office Department looking to the increase of mail facilities in this country within the last one hundred years. My father, who was born in 1803 and died three or four months ago at the age of 98, told me that when he was 12 years old he rode 12 miles to mail his first letter and paid 25 cents postage. Now, before he died, I succeeded in putting a free rural route by his door, and at 98 years of age he had his mail delivered daily without cost. That is quite a step, Mr. Chairman, in the progress made on that line. For a long time we had nothing but weekly mails for country people; once a week they stopped their plow and hung up their hoe and went up to the post-office; then came the triweekly service, and recently quite a number of country post-offices with short routes running out from railroad towns have had daily mails; and only a few years ago this rural free-delivery mail began as an experiment and has succeeded beyond the expectation of its most ardent supporters, and that under the present plan. Why not let well enough alone?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the committee that if the rural sections in this country are entitled to a free daily mail delivery they should have a reliable one and a prompt one; and any action on the part of Congress that would disorganize or derange in any way the progress of the mail facilities to the people, as now organized, would be a crime, whether intended or not, and at sometimes we are taught to pray, and truthfully, too, "God save us from our friends." When the first appropriation was made in 1894, the Postmaster-General refused to use it; so with the second in 1895, and also with the third in 1896. The objection then, as now, was, it would be too expensive. On many of the oldest routes established the system is practically self-sustaining, the patrons are rejoicing and proud of the interest taken by the Government in their behalf. As a rule they are satisfied with the carriers, and now while satisfaction reigns comes this proposition to make a radical change in the system, and one that has worked so unsatisfactory in the "star-route plan."

I say that these people are entitled to a good and reliable mail service. From the conservative rural middle class of our country comes the dominating men in every section of our land, in every department of life. There is not a town, or a city, or an industrial enterprise—there is not even a Congressional district represented on this floor—that is an exception to this proposition. The prosperity and the stability of this Republic of ours depend not upon the boys bred and raised in the cities but upon the men and the women reared in the country. Then why not step aside if necessary, as the chairman in charge of this bill seems to think, and spend a little more money than we are in the habit of spending to help this class of people when we are so dependent upon them for much that is good and great in this country of ours?

Again, Mr. Chairman, the carrier in the rural service is simply a substitute for the fourth-class postmaster. Under this service such officers have been largely abolished. The carrier ought to be bonded, and he must be; he ought to be personally liable to the Government, and he must be, in order to make this system a success. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but he must be in touch, in sympathy, with the very people that he serves. Otherwise there is no guarantee of his acceptability to them or to his success in discharging his duties.

Mr. Chairman, I was surprised to hear the gentleman in charge of this bill and others making the argument here that we ought not to establish this system because these rural carriers would combine and come down upon the House of Representatives like a horde of eagles upon a carcass and destroy our individuality and our liberty of judgment and conscience to legislate as we should. Sir, why has not the chairman of this committee in charge of this bill been heard on the floor of this House on this question in the years gone by?

When the Ways and Means Committee has given hearing after hearing to associations of manufacturers, to beet-sugar combines, the Havemeyer combine, and all the combines that have been crowded upon this House and have influenced legislation, and to a great extent controlled our tariff bills for the last fifteen years, not one single word has escaped the lips of the gentleman from California. No limitation has been proposed to their electioneering and lobbying. No alarm has been sounded by him or others who have taken such an active part in favor of this bill to put rural carriers under contract for fear that they may in the future influence legislation in their interest.

No, Mr. Chairman, these mighty organizations can come and go; they can throng our committee rooms, block our passageways, and lobby day in and day out; but a bugaboo was started when some carriers in the little town of Meadville, Pa., undertook to organize a carriers' association for the purpose of asking Congress to increase their pay and regulate the length of their routes, and from this—drawing upon his imagination—the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] can see in the near future 25,000 carriers combined to rob the Treasury and defeat any Congressman who may object to or refuse to comply with their wishes or petitions. Others on this side of the House fear, in close Democratic districts, that these carriers will become a mighty political machine and control for the party in power, and thus defeat the wishes or preference of the voters by some unforeseen or imaginary process.

It is not my purpose to vote for any measure that tends to lessen Democratic influence or membership on the floor of this House, and pardon me for the suggestion to such of my colleagues as have this fear that to vote for this bill, which is a clear discrimination against rural sections and rural carriers, is by far more dangerous and objectional to our rural population than any adverse action that can be taken by a combine of carriers. This fear and the argument in its support are too thin to be put before an intelligent rural population in my opinion.

As soon as the Department got wind of the organization hereinbefore referred to and the purpose for which it was created, it issued peremptory orders to the carriers to cease their lobbying efforts, and they complied. President Roosevelt, immediately upon having the matter brought to his notice, issued an Executive order prohibiting any organization of Government employees for the purpose indicated in this rural carriers' organization. In the face of the action taken by the Department and the President, why keep this fear of rural carriers' combine before this House?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Did I understand the gentleman to say that under the order of President Roosevelt these postal matters are entirely free from partisanship or party control?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I did not take that position.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir. When the world comes to an end and all political parties are dismantled, then postal matters may be entirely free from partisanship or party control.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Is not the service as fully safeguarded by civil-service rules as it can be?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir. The Civil Service Commission has had but little chance at rural mail clerks or carriers. The President covered all the clerks under civil service last November, including special agents and inspectors, and that without any kind of examination; also all the carriers, from February 1 last, to be appointed.

"This is a service for the people" and should be as much as possible "by the people." The President and Civil Service Commission should not interfere with it, unless asked to do so by the people or their immediate representatives. All the duties of the city carriers and more have been conferred upon the rural carriers. They register and deliver registered letters, give receipts for money orders and fill out money orders, make special deliveries in the same way for the same fees as the city carriers, and deliver pension checks. The carrier service up to date has been almost free from criticism and objection, either by the Department or the people.

The adoption of this bill will be, in my opinion, destructive to the whole system, by putting the mail service of the country back under the inefficient, unreliable method of the star-route service, which was originally started by the Continental Congress and has remained with but little change since, and out of this contract system has come the greatest scandals which have disturbed the postal administration of the United States.

If the two chief reasons given in support of this bill are to be recognized—cheapness, and as a prevention to combines and organizations likely to affect legislation—why not apply it to city carriers? Why not to the rural mail clerks? Why not let to the lowest bidder the entire postal system and have all mail transported and delivered under contract? What is there to hinder the thousands of contractors, if this bill becomes a law, from combining and giving the Congressman from California trouble? In my opinion, a combination of contractors would be more dangerous than an organization of country boys as carriers.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to bring to the attention of the committee some of the most objectionable features of the bill. In line 19 this clause begins: "The service shall be awarded to the lowest bidder," not the lowest and the best. Same old curse to follow that the country people have had to endure for a hundred years—unreliable, unworthy persons, if the lowest bidder, as now under the star-route system. Again, this language appears: "But the Postmaster-General may reject all proposals submitted under any advertisement." Under this clause, if the bill becomes a law, the Postmaster-General will have absolute control. He can turn down all bids and appoint direct, in some way to be devised by him, every carrier in the service.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Suppose the lowest bidder has not the qualifications required in the bill, has not the Postmaster-General the right to reject him and accept one who is qualified under the bill?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I have said that there is a clause in the bill giving the Postmaster-General absolute control of every carrier, whether fit or unfit, whether acceptable to the people or not.

Talk of rural carriers combining and interfering with Congressional elections and defeating Congressmen in close districts, and here the advocates of the bill propose to give the Postmaster-General the right to appoint every one, or as many as he may elect, and if a Republican or Democratic Postmaster-General he will have the temptation to control all close districts by objecting to lowest bidder and substitute his appointee.

Since the day that God made the world all enterprises and schemes that are new, that reach out for the betterment of mankind, for the development of country or humanity, have been fought and always will be. Many men are constitutional kickers. Some men by training know nothing else and can do nothing else. They are a burden upon the community or State, and must be carried with as little friction or cost as possible. They never put their shoulders to the wheel to help up the hill, but are busy casting impediments in the highway.

As a farmer, living on the farm, a friend of rural free-mail delivery, believe me when I say that if the "service is continued on present lines it will greatly aid and facilitate the development of rural districts, make farm life more comfortable and far more desirable, increase the value of farm lands, and tend to prevent the further congestion of population in large cities, which has become a peril to our institutions," as has been well said by the minority of the committee in the report. Later on, if the fears anticipated by the friends of the bill should arise, then the remedy can be applied. Congress will always be competent to legislate so as to correct evils when evident. Why take chances on reorganization while the present plan runs so smoothly? Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. [Loud applause.]

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the district which I represent is admirably adapted to the establishment of rural free-delivery routes, has some, and more are expected, I have been deeply interested in the debate which has been going on on this subject for the last few days. When it was first introduced into this House during the consideration of the urgent deficiency bill, I supposed, and I think we all had reason to suppose, that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was satisfied with the regulations of the Post-Office Department and would not assume the position which its members do now. In the course of the discussion at that time the following colloquy occurred:

Mr. CURTIS. I believe that we ought to pay these men what it is worth to carry the mail; I think it is an outrage to make them carry it at $500 a year and furnish their own horses.

Mr. LOUD. Now, let me say that I am heartily in accord with the sentiment of the gentleman from Kansas.

Further on he stated:

I recognize that an increase of salary had to be made.

But now we are confronted with an entirely different proposition, we are threatened, according to the arguments of the gentlemen in favor of this bill, with an inundation of extravagance on the part of the Post-Office Department in the years to come. It is stated that there will be soon 60,000 of these rural free-delivery carriers, and that there will be $100,000,000 expended in sustaining the system as it now exists. Mr. Chairman, the Congress of the United States has never so shaped its legislation as to make the revenues of the Post-Office Department equal to the expenditures. On the contrary, just so fast as the revenues have crept up to an even line with the expenditures, just so fast has the Congress of the United States for the purpose of affording better facilities to the people, with opportunities for education and enlightenment, and the better to meet the demands in the evolution of the industrial enterprises of the country, cut down the expense to the individual in carrying on his postal business and thereby increased the expense to the Government, except so far as it might be made up by the increase of the business of the Department which might result from the change.

I have taken a little pains to look this matter up and I now desire to present a few statistics upon this point. In 1860 the deficit in the Post-Office Department amounted to $10,000,000. In 1882, for the first time in thirty-one years, there was a surplus of $1,394,388.92. The moment that the Postmaster-General so reported to the Congress of the United States, in the early winter of 1883, Congress passed a law by which letter postage was reduced from 3 to 2 cents. It went into operation in October 1883, and in 1884 there was a deficit again of $5,204,484.12, and yet, notwithstanding this deficit occasioned by that change in giving greater facilities to the people, Congress again, in 1884, increased the weight from one-half an ounce to an ounce at which letters could be forwarded and increased the weight upon newspapers and periodicals to double the weight at which they were formerly forwarded.

I desire to call the attention of this House to the fact that ever since 1883 and 1884, when these changes were made, there has been a deficit. I have the figures here, which I will incorporate in the RECORD.

1881	[a]2,466,338	1894	[a]9,243,935
1882	[b]1,394,388	1895	[a]9,807,044
1884	[a]5,204,484	1896	[a]8,127,088
1885	[a]8,381,571	1898	[a]9,620,905
1886	[a]6,900,000	1899	[a]6,610,776
1889	[a]6,610,776	1901	[a]3,932,727

[a] Deficit. [b] Surplus.

The significant fact about this matter is that notwithstanding all these changes, notwithstanding all these reductions, notwithstanding the increased facilities which have been given to the people, notwithstanding the fact that in 1886 there were less than 200 towns and cities in the United States which had free delivery, and there are now 16,389 free-delivery carriers and more than 32,000,000 people accommodated under the free-delivery system, with the service increased in every possible way the ingenuity of the Post-Office Department could devise, we find to-day the deficit in the Post-Office Department is not more than one-half what it was in 1860; I call the attention of the House to the statements presented for the year 1901. At the beginning of the fiscal year there were 1,276 rural free-delivery carriers appointed; whereas at the time when the report of the Postmaster-General was issued there were over 4,301, with nearly one-fourth of the whole country that was eligible for the appointment of rural free-delivery carriers covered, you would naturally expect, owing to the enormous expense entailed, that there would be a great deficit in our postal receipts.

The deficit for the past year was only $3,932,727.48, and the Postmaster-General, in figuring up for the year 1902 and 1903, says that although 8,000 routes will be established by July 1 and 5,700,000 people accommodated the deficit for 1902 will only be $2,104,688, and for 1903, with all the additional routes added, $2,710,946. That is, with these routes extended all over our country, with all the improved facilities which the Post-Office Department will have given us, the deficit will be only about one-fourth of what it was in the year 1860, when scarcely any of these great improvements existed. So this cry of extravagance has no basis in fact, and if it did have any basis, then I claim it is found in the bill which the committee are advocating before this House. For if there is any bill which, to my mind, throws wide open the door of fraud it is this bill under which the contract system would be established for rural free-delivery carriers.

The bill provides that there shall be but one carrier in one district, given to the lowest bidder. These districts will not average more than 125 families, or not more than at most four or five hundred people. Now, let me suppose a few cases where fraud and extravagance can come in. I maintain if you must take the carriers from the districts where they live, as is emphatically insisted upon by those who advocate this measure, you would not possibly secure more than three who would put in bids. That would be an extraordinary number considering the small number of people who would have the facilities to carry on the work in a scattered rural community. Of these there will be two who do not care very much whether they receive the contract or not, and by a wink or a nod of the head, by means which it will be impossible for anyone to detect in a court of law or by any legal process, the first man may put in a bid for $1,200, the second for $1,100, and the third, whom they expect is to get the contract, puts in a bid for $1,000. He gets it because he is the lowest bidder and because there is nothing against his character, and the Government by such a system is defrauded out of at least one-half of that amount.

The same work which that man does might be done for five or six hundred dollars under the classified system which now exists. But do you believe that in the average rural free-delivery district you would be apt to find more than one man who would be willing and desirous to secure this contract?

Supposing, now, there are three in all who are willing to undertake the contract? Two are fairly well off, and are not anxious to secure it unless a large profit can be made. The third has been a man of influence, a benevolent, public-spirited man, who has had the misfortune to lose his property and no business to support him. Do you believe the first two would press their claims? Their neighbors would gather around them, urge them, advise them, persuade them not to bid, representing that the neighborhood owed a debt of gratitude to the third man which could be partly repaid by giving him the contract, so that they retire and he, as the only bidder, procures the contract at his own figures, at double what he would receive under the classified plan now in force.

Again, if no one bids, the Government must pay an extravagant price, for it is then at the mercy of one man. He must be employed or the route abandoned, and he gets it at his own price.

No matter what supposition you make, in view of the peculiar situation of limiting the contract to a bidder living in the district I believe one of the three cases above would, as a rule, arise, and just so surely would an exorbitant price have to be paid. If the advocates of this bill are consistent, why have they not protested against the employment, under the civil service, of carriers in our cities and large towns? The objections are applicable almost as much in one case as the other. If anything, the contract system is better adapted to city carriers than to rural free delivery, for the former work is systematized, confined to fixed routes, divested of complications, and limited to delivery alone. The rural free-delivery carrier has a complexity of duties to perform, requiring local knowledge and more or less of business experience.

Not a man has had the temerity to advocate such a measure for the free-delivery carriers, for the service has been so satisfactorily administered as to meet the universal approbation of the country. A proposition of that sort I do not believe would command a vote. It would be execrated everywhere and result in inexplicable confusion in post-office affairs.

Worse than all, however, is the provision in this bill leaving to the Postmaster-General the final adjudication of the contract. He becomes the arbiter. The lowest bid amounts to little if in his judgment the applicant is unsuitable. No one can supervise his action. You can not interpolate rules and regulations to govern his conduct. The statute must be construed strictly, and when the power given in it is unlimited it can not be modified, controlled, or changed by any custom of the service or code devised to limit its operation. When the bids are in who knows whether the lowest bidder or the best man will get the job? The highest bidder may be the local boss; he may control the primaries; he may have been the local manager of the successful Congressman in his last campaign, who demands of him a return as a reward for his efforts. The Congressman must so present in glowing colors the inefficiency of the lowest bidders, that they will be rejected and he accepted.

Once more, as in the old days, when spoils made public life a scandal and debauched the consciences of public officials and public men, many of us and of our successors would take up the office-seeker's burden again.

As a firm believer in civil-service reform, I oppose such a proposition, believing it to be demoralizing in its nature and detrimental to the successful administration of a great Department of the Government. There is no call for this bill; not a petition has been presented in its favor; not a letter has been read sustaining it; not a Post-Office official who has had anything to do with its inauguration or management approves of it. From every section of the country remonstrances against it have been pouring in, and we are asked to keep the high standards of Administration untampered with, in accordance with the best methods which experience has shown produces honesty, efficiency, and the best results. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SWANSON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER].

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Chairman, during the ten years that I have been a member of this House, I have learned, in listening to the debates on the multitude of propositions that have been presented here, that there are gentlemen on this floor who can make a good argument on either side of a question.

I realize that there are two sides to most propositions which come up for discussion here. The varied interests and conditions of the country give rise to divergent views upon nearly every public question. But the argument and practical policy of the question before the House are so clearly on one side that I am at a loss to understand why there should be a difference of opinion in relation to it.

The great advantages derived by the people from the rural free-delivery system, I take it, are not in question in this discussion. We are all agreed upon the merits of the system, and it is upon a question of administration only that we disagree.

The leading points that have been made in favor of the bill placing the rural-delivery service under the contract system are, first, that it will prove economical to the Government and will equalize the compensation of the carriers, and, second, that it will largely remove the service from political influences.

As to the first proposition, it is a remarkable fact that where service is to be rendered in the country or rural districts the question of economy is always predominant; but we hear no complaint of the fact that in the cities the carriers of mail receive from $600 to $1,000 per annum for eight hours' service, nor do we hear the proponents of this bill complaining that the number of carriers for the cities has been doubled in order that the mail can be delivered from four to ten times a day to a population living within easy reach of the post-office, the most remote being not more than half a mile away from the main post-office or a substation, with street cars penetrating every section of the city, and beautifully paved streets to walk on in case exercise is desired. These highly favored fellow-citizens must have mail carriers who are exempt from the injurious contract system, lest the service be crippled, the question of economy not being considered; but it must be applied to the rural mail carrier, it matters not how much it will degrade and lower the standard of the service.

Why this discrimination in favor of the cities? Can it be successfully contended that the city can not be laid off into routes as clearly defined as those in the country, or that the city service requires superior fitness or qualities not required in the rural carrier? There can be no force in the first proposition, and it is well known that the city carrier is not required to register letters, handle receipts for the same, or sell stamps and envelopes, all of which the rural carrier is required to do. If you will examine the question you will find that the carrier on rural routes has much greater responsibilities than the carrier on the city routes. He is in fact a traveling post-office, and if a discrimination is to be made it should be in his favor. Besides, the city carrier does not have to undergo the hardship of exposure to rain, sleet, snow, mud, and all kinds of weather. Many of the large buildings in New York and Chicago, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois, require four and five carriers to deliver the mail to the occupants. Is it to be contended that these carriers who ride on elevators in comfortable buildings shall be exempt from the contract system and allowed to draw from $800 to $1,000 per annum, while the rural carrier, with greater responsibilities and compelled to undergo exposure to all kinds of weather, is to be ground down to the lowest price which a competitive bid will force?

If economy is your object—and you contend that millions of dollars will be saved annually to the Government by the contract system—why put the $7,000,000 paid the rural carriers under the contract system, and at the same time squander over seventeen millions to the city carrier under the salary system? I will go further and say, If the contract system will result in as good service and a saving of millions in the rural free-delivery service, why do you not frame a bill and pass it putting the Railway Mail Service and the postmasters throughout the country under the same economical system? You could easily have all applicants who pass an examination submit bids for the service by contract, and let it go to the lowest responsible bidder.

Your answer that the law now provides for salaries to the city carrier, the railway mail clerk, and the postmasters, and that you are not now dealing with that problem, is no answer. The Post-Office and Post-Roads Committee has the right and power to frame a bill and present to this House providing for the repeal of existing law, and is it to be said that where inequalities exist, where a useless waste of public money can be prevented by a change in the law, that this body which created the law is to stand in awe of an act because it protects a certain favored class and gives to the city carrier, railway mail clerk, and postmasters a salary system at a loss of millions to the Government? Will you refuse to repeal the law, and at the same time strike down the rural carrier to a competitive-bid basis, a contract system, which has never given satisfaction to the people after a fair trial, upon the false and specious plea of economy? If economy is what we are after, let us be consistent; let us commence at the beginning and carry it all along through the service of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee [Mr. LOUD] has opposed in the past many needed reforms in the postal service and stood, as he stands to-day, in opposition to the policies advocated by the Post-Office Department, as well as by many of the best informed men on postal matters in the country. I remember in the last Congress when I offered an amendment to the Post-Office bill, providing that all towns should have free delivery, he opposed the amendment, and it was ruled out on a point of order. I then appealed to him to report a bill, giving the House an opportunity to do justice to more than 20,000,000 of our people who live in towns without free-delivery service. I stated to him that the cities above 10,000 inhabitants had free delivery and the country had rural delivery, and that the House ought to have an opportunity to do tardy justice to the towns; but he and his committee refused to take any steps in that direction.

We tried last session to amend the star-route service by requiring the contractor to live on the route, and in that way remedy the evil that existed in that service, but the amendment was ruled out on a point of order made by the chairman of the committee, who was against the amendment. The Post-Office Department, however, realizing the miserable service that the rural districts had to endure by reason of the subcontracting system, issued an order to the effect that all new contracts in the star-route service should be let to residents on the route. This reform, which was resisted by the chairman of the committee, has been indorsed by him to-day. So we may expect to find the honorable gentleman contending against the contract system one year from now. His recommendation of this so-called reform, therefore, loses much of its force and effect when viewed in the light of his mistakes of the past.

Again, it has been contended by the advocates of the bill that the length of the routes are not uniform; that the roads vary from level, macadamized, to hilly, mountainous, and muddy roads, and that, therefore, the contract system is the only just and equitable one. In reply to this contention, I will state what every member knows to be true, that on many of the worst roads to be traveled the anxious bidder, under the contract system, will, in his anxiety for the contract, do as has been done in the star-route service, submit a bid much below the amount paid for service over better roads and for less than the service will actually cost. It may be said that that is the contractor's fault. But that will not equalize the service; nor better it, surely. Must we have economy at the cost of total ruin and destruction of the service? Is such a proposition worthy of the name of economy? A better plan than that proposed by this bill would be to pay all carriers $25 per mile, and a certain per cent additional in all cases where the roads to be traveled are of such nature as to make the additional per cent equitable, the route agent or inspector being required to report on the condition of the roads.

This plan will pay the carrier on a route of 24 miles $600, which is adequate, and will, in addition, guarantee good service in every community. But I contend that the per cent for bad roads is not so necessary as would appear at first glance, for the reason that $25 per mile will not, as a rule, be more compensation to the carrier who travels good roads than it will be to the carrier who travels rough roads. The opportunities to make money and to save money will about equalize the difference in the condition of the roads; that is to say, the carrier who travels good roads, the community being populous, living will be higher and expenses greater, while, on the other hand, his opportunity to make a dollar will be greater; whereas the carrier on bad roads will be able to live for less, his expenses will be less, and his money will buy more in his thinly settled community.

As to the political phase of this proposition, I fail to see much difference between the two systems. The party in power can use either for political purposes, and if the Republican Administration uses it we will have the same privilege when we come into power. I have never heard of any system, the civil service included, that could not be manipulated in the interest of the party in power. I remember discussing the civil service with an officer of the Government who had taken charge of a bureau of one of the departments. I said to him: "Suppose you had a chief of division or a clerk in your bureau who was objectionable to you, what could you do under the rules of the civil service, while he performed efficient service, to rid yourself of him?" He replied that it would be easy to abolish the office held by the objectionable person, and after he was out reestablish it.

I unhesitatingly state that if I was in charge of any department of this Government, with the responsibility of good administration resting on me, I would want employees in full accord and harmony with me, and would certainly feel kindly, therefore, to the adherents of the party to which I belong. If it seems desirable, the party in power can manipulate the offices under any system. This we might as well concede now. The rural service under the salary system is about as free, and more so, perhaps, from political manipulation as any other service of the Government. I desire to say that every appointee in my district, some seventy-odd, who is engaged in delivering the mail on rural routes, has been appointed upon my recommendation, and every one of them, so far as I know, is a Democrat, and I presume those who will be appointed there to complete the service will be Democrats.

But you Democratic members in close districts, who have not been so well treated, and have had no voice in naming the carriers, how can you improve that condition under the contract system? The special agent, under that system, will pass upon or examine the bids and recommend which bid shall be accepted, and the Department will have the right of selection. Both plans, I believe, are equally capable of being used for political purposes, if so desired. The recent order requiring all applicants for carrier's position to stand an examination removes the service as far from political influence as is possible under any system.

Then the question is narrowed down to this one proposition—the best service at the lowest price, everything being considered. I am, therefore, against this bill, and in my judgment we will accomplish the best results by passing the appropriation for the rural delivery service just as we do for the city delivery service, in a lump sum and without restriction, leaving to the Department the task of working out the details along lines suggested by experience and a wide knowledge of postal affairs. The Department has developed the service to its present high state of usefulness to the general satisfaction of the country and a large majority of this House, and I have heard no sound reason for a change except upon the ground of economy and freedom from political influence, both of which arguments have been fully answered and left without force in this discussion.

Let me, in conclusion, appeal to the friends of rural free delivery to stand in solid phalanx against this bill, and every other proposition brought in here by the enemies of the service. This appeal is made on behalf of millions of our people who live on farms or follow other avocations away from the mail advantages of towns and cities. Before the establishment of rural delivery these people rarely received mail more than once or twice a week, and were, consequently, practically cut off from knowledge of and interest in the affairs of the world. Only those who have led the life of a farmer in the thinly settled communities of this country can properly appreciate the great blessing that this service is to the country people.

I beg you not to cripple it by any false notions of economy. The farmer who was wont to labor in the fields day in and day out and go home at night to his frugal meal and lonely fireside, with nothing to relieve the monotony of existence save, perhaps, the occasional visit of a friend from the neighboring farm, is now taking a daily paper, which is delivered at his door, and after his work is over he reads it and keeps abreast of the times. He has thrown off the lethargy of isolation and taken on the spirit of progress and improvement. He receives daily reports from the markets, and knows when and where to send his produce for sale; he introduces new methods in his work, which reduces labor and expense; he diversifies his crops according to the demands of the market, and he takes a lively interest in the public questions of the day. He is, in short, an up-to-date American citizen, broadening and expanding in productive power and intellectual force, and it is but just to say that the system of bringing to him his mail daily has been a great step in the accomplishment of this wonderful change. Let us not take from the country people the one boon that the Government has given them directly; but let us foster it and improve it, so that it will meet the growing needs of the hour, and in building up the country people build up every other occupation and branch of industry. [Applause.]

Mr. SWANSON. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. IRWIN].

Mr. IRWIN. Mr. Chairman, in what I have to say I am not influenced by any considerations of policy. I am opposed to the pending bill because I believe in the present carrier system and do not believe in the contract system in rural free-delivery service.

Mr. Chairman, I have examined with much interest and pride the bill making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and I desire to speak a word on that bill while discussing the bill now before the House. I wish to commend the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads for its very lucid and comprehensive report.

The large appropriation carried by the bill, amounting to $137,916,598.75, is only justified if all of the people are to be benefited. The bill is generally free from cheeseparing economy, which is always the forerunner of waste and of a subsequent larger appropriation to cover the losses entailed thereby.

I heartily commend the increase of $907,840 to overworked and underpaid railway mail clerks, and as strongly commend the increase of nearly $2,000,000 for clerk hire, and am especially pleased to observe that most of the same goes to low-salaried clerks.

I am glad to see the increased appropriation of $1,349,550 to the brave letter carriers in the free-delivery service. Their duties are most arduous. They work while we sleep. They endure the hardships of inclement weather. They toil for us day by day, in the blizzards' blasts of winter and under the burning sun of summer.

An ordinary committee—one less thoughtful—would have overlooked them as obscure. All these, and other increases in the bill, are justified by the growth of the postal service and the great necessity for efficient and reliable servants.

But, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the provisions embodied in the pending bill for substituting contract service on rural free-delivery routes for carrier service is not in harmony with the spirit of the appropriation bill and with the progress of the service.

I have the honor to represent a district where both city and rural free delivery obtains. Why, I ask, shall we diminish the efficiency of either service; but if either, why select for the inefficient service the country districts, where supervision is more difficult and more costly?

In the city the people have telephones, parcel delivery, express companies, on which they can rely when the mail service is inefficient, but in the country the mail is the only reliance. Bank checks are sent in city mails, money orders and money itself in country mails.

The great importance and value to the country people in the present system of rural free delivery is in the fact that the carrier can supply stamps and stamped envelopes for the accommodation of patrons on his route.

He is required to deliver special-delivery and pension letters to the addressees, to cancel stamps on letters collected by him, in order that he may deliver letters on route as may be intended for such delivery before his return to the post-office. In a word, he performs the duties of a postmaster; and when the paying of money orders by carriers is extended to the rural branch of the service he will perform all the functions of a postmaster at a money-order office. Under the contract system these results would not be attained.

The service would necessarily be placed in the hands of an inferior class of persons, and the efficiency and value of the service be thereby greatly lowered.

The committee report that it is substantially impossible for them to fix any rate of salary equitable for all routes, yet they think bidders and supervisors by the Post-Office Department can arrive at such a salary by public bids. I submit that an equitable salary may be arranged by allowing an honest, living American wage to each carrier doing an honest day's work.

Leave it to the Department to fix the routes. If one route is over good roads or in a sparsely settled community, make it longer or heavier than another less favorably situated.

Would the United States ask a man to work day in and day out for less than $600 and furnish his own wagon and team? There can be no properly arranged route anywhere in this country in which the carrier will not fully earn his salary and in which the people served will not be benefited fully for the outlay. While the star-route service is now freer from scandal than it has been in the past, is it not still in many instances unworthy of the wealth and dignity of this great nation?

In the gently undulating blue-grass region of Kentucky—the fairest spot on earth, inhabited by a most cultured people, and stocked with the finest horses in the world—might be seen in this star-route service a blind mule attached to a ramshackle vehicle carrying the United States mail. In behalf of the thoroughbreds of Kentucky, I protest against a blind mule representing the United States.

What a spectacle for a great and wealthy government! Under such a system only a merciful Providence could tell when the farmers could expect the mail to reach them, and yet these farmers are business men in the sustaining industry of the nation.

In that service collusion and combinations of bidders have lost many dollars of the people's money, yet the proposed bill would again inflict it on the country districts. Under this bill the bidders must be residents of the district to be served, must be reliable, trustworthy, of good moral character, able to read and write, and having sufficient intelligence to perform the duties.

All that sounds well, but could be made a loophole to reject a lower bid. By such restrictions, under such a system and the charges their publication would involve, combinations and collusions would be encouraged.

The rural free delivery is just begun. The provisions of this bill will, in my judgment, if enacted into law, be its death blow. The President, with his usual interest in the affairs of the plain people, has seen the success of the system and placed the carriers under the civil service. The effect of the provisions of this bill would be to overthrow and condemn his order.

In this one instance, Mr. Chairman, the committee, I think, has been inconsiderate. The people of this country—farm and city—must be served alike. The mail is their public servant.

The United States is responsible for its efficiency under either system. Let us not shirk, and let us not be too timid to provide the proper agencies for honest and intelligent service.

I am in favor of proper economy always, but the American people do not expect or approve niggardliness. My constituency and others demand a broad-minded, far-seeing, business-like, and upbuilding policy. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SWANSON. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER].

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, after four days' discussion of this subject, it can not be expected that I shall say anything new, and I shall not endeavor to impose upon the House by saying much that is old. We are here at the parting of the ways. Those of us who believe in the rural free-delivery system, that it is the most beneficial and economic of any portion of the civil service in this country, will follow in the line of the leaders of this project and vote against the bill. Those who have been opposed from the beginning to the free-delivery service, and have put all the obstacles they could in its way, will vote for the bill. They are the wreckers of the scheme and system for rural free-delivery service.

The only argument that I have heard worthy, in my mind, the name of an argument in behalf of this bill is that delivered by the eloquent and able gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. In support of the bill he said that he wanted it passed because he felt that if it should become a law there would be less demand in certain districts for the establishment of these rural routes. He said that under the existing system some man, wishing to be a letter carrier, might go around among his friends or neighbors, stir them up, and get them to sign a petition for the establishment of a route in that district when really there was no demand for it. He urged that if this bill should go into effect communities would be rid of that nuisance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think there is but little weight in that argument. I do not believe there is any portion of this country so benighted that the people will sign a petition for the introduction of the free-delivery service among them simply because some person would like the position of letter carrier in that district. The second reason given by the gentleman why the bill ought to pass was that if this bill should become a law the service could be conducted more economically than at present—not more cheaply in the objectionally sense in which "cheap" is sometimes used, but more economically.

I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi and others who may be disposed to think with him, whether they believe that anywhere within the confines of our country, outside of the Philippines, $500 a year is too much money for any man to receive for three hundred days' personal service of his own and the furnishing of two horses, with harness, wagon, and the like? Up to within a few days past we have been paying for this service a salary of $500 a year. That covers service every day of the year except Sundays and holidays, amounting to a little more than three hundred days.

A salary of $500 for three hundred days' service amounts to $1.65 a day. In our part of the country—up in God's country—the roads are the best anywhere in the United States; and yet it has been found necessary that the man performing this service should have at his command two horses, for no single horse can endure 25 miles' travel every day, six days in the week, through the year. Therefore these rural carriers in that part of the country keep two horses. These are to be maintained—shod and fed—and the wagons are to be kept in readiness for work. Yet for providing and maintaining this team and for the carrier's own personal service he receives but $1.65 a day. Mr. Chairman, there is no place within the United States—not even in Mississippi, where nature with her abundant hand almost entirely feeds and clothes the people—there is no place in the United States where we ought to expect an intelligent man, a sober man, an able-bodied man, to work for less than 100 cents a day; and that amount up in our State is termed pauper wages.

The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] said that some of us in these last few years had tasted the sweets of political preferment. Let me remark that for me the "sweetness" has turned to gall and vinegar. In our section of the country it is almost absolutely impossible to procure anyone who will carry this rural mail at the salary allowed. A year and a half ago one route was located in my Congressional district, and from the time of its location until now it has been absolutely impossible to find in the district a man who will take the position of carrier of the mail for $500 a year, and it has not been possible to get the system into operation for the want of a carrier. Why should any competent man accept the service at that price? In Massachusetts but a very small percentage of wage earners receive less than $1.65 or $1.75 per day for their personal services, and the great majority of our wage earners, skilled and unskilled laborers, receive more than $1.75 per day. Under the salary which has been allowed for this carrier service, as I have said, a man receives $1.65 for his own personal service and for the care and maintenance of a team. I say you can not expect to get fair service for a less amount than is now paid.

You are going to let out this service to the lowest bidder, are you? Up in our section of the country the letting of contracts for carrying the mail to the lowest bidder has fallen into disgrace. The star-route mail service between the city of Worcester, where I reside, and Leicester, 6 miles distant, was carried on in an old ramshackle vehicle, with the harness tied together with strings, and the horse so poor that you could nearly read a newspaper through him. The people of our city complained that it was a disgrace that the mails of the United States Government should be carried in any such kind of a concern. It was so dilapidated, unsightly, and shabby that I have not seen anything to approach it, unless it be the herdic service in this city on Fifteenth street, which approaches but does not equal it in shabbiness.

Now, it has been said that under this bill, if passed, there would be less of partisan politics in connection with this service. I want to say that while I am not a great believer in the civil-service system, and never have been, for I think its provisions are abused in many instances by the party in power, still I believe that under the system as now carried on there will be less petty party politics exercised than under the provisions of this bill.

The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], as I understood him, said—and said he wished his voice to echo down Pennsylvania avenue, so that it might be distinctly heard at the White House—that while it had been declared by the President that hereafter the persons in this service should be appointed to office strictly in conformity with civil-service regulations, it had been whispered around—this is the way I understood the allegation of the gentleman from California—it had been whispered around among the members here that they would be allowed to look out for the offices in their own district. I undertake to say that the provisions of these rules promulgated by the rural free-delivery department of the Post-Office Department hedge about and protect applicants for the position of carrier as well as applicants are protected in any other department of the Government by the civil service. I wish I had time to go through these regulations. Here is one:

> Political and religious affiliations of applicants shall not be taken into consideration, nor shall political indorsements, but fitness for the service alone.

If these provisions are carried out, and they have been heretofore up in my State, I think the applicants are as well protected as it is possible to devise means to protect them and give all a fair and equal chance. Sometimes a person will be appointed by reason of his politics—a Republican, for instance, in place of a Democrat. Thus hath it ever been. But I want to ask my Democratic friends, If that has occurred more or less frequently heretofore in your districts, what do you think it will be when, if it is true, as has been alleged on this floor by a Republican, that the President of the United States has whispered to members of this House that they can under the system now proposed control the patronage in their own districts?

When the applications are made, when the bids for this service are opened, do you not suppose the Postmaster-General will "whisper" to the applicants who are bidding for these positions? He will have but his own discretion to control him, and if the President is willing to "whisper" to the members of this House he will have to whisper but once under your bill, and that will be to the Postmaster-General. I do not take any stock in this story about whispering anyway; but if there is anything in it, then I say it will be far more convenient to whisper under this bill than it is now with the system in force.

Up in my district, my friends, I want to say that there have been four rural free-delivery districts established and two city deliveries since I came to Congress, and I think I have recommended, with the exception of two persons, all that have been appointed. I assert that I did not at the time I recommended the carriers and do not now know the politics of one of those men, and I do not care what their politics are. We were only anxious that the persons who were most able to do the work should receive the appointment, and as I said before, we had to beg of those men to accept the positions at the very low salary which they are now receiving.

Now, my friends, look to this provision of this bill, you who are so anxious to take this matter of appointing letter carriers out of politics. Those now carrying the mails can continue to carry them "until such time as the Postmaster-General shall advertise for proposals and make awards for the several routes on which such carriers are now employed." If this bill goes into effect they propose to make this rural free delivery a political bureau, as it has been called, and destroy every feature of the old system under which the service has so prospered and become so popular. Why, friends, I can not understand how there can be any section of this country so low down that the influence of a few simple-minded letter carriers can change the politics of that State or that district. If there is any such place it is a good place to move from, and I ask those unfortunate citizens to come up with me into the higher and purer atmosphere of politics and national civilization where letter carriers receiving from the Government the princely pay of $1 per day can not change the politics of a State or district. [Applause.]

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I yield forty minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect anything that I may say on this subject to affect the vote upon this question, but I desire to present some reasons which I consider sufficient for giving my support to this bill. I shall not consume any time in defending the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], who has been the subject of so much criticism and attack from gentlemen on the other side. I will only say that with people who respect and admire honest men in public office the gentleman from California needs no defense. [Applause.]

Quite a number of gentlemen opposing this bill have proceeded upon the assumption, and it was an assumption, that those who favor this legislation are against the system of rural free delivery. I deny it. I have the honor to represent a purely agricultural district composed of farmers intelligent and sufficiently educated to appreciate the advantages of this system of mail delivery, and they are desirous of having its blessings made as wide as possible and brought as nearly as possible within the reach of all. But, my friends, you must not forget that they are intelligent enough to know that if it is carried out through all sections of this great country it is going to be a pretty expensive proposition, and the farmer, while he wants the blessings, has the intelligence to want them at as reasonable cost as possible. The farmers in my district would rather have two routes at a reasonable cost, where two routes are needed, than one route at a high and extravagant cost. I was amused to hear even a Democrat to-day upon this floor speak of the question of economy as a miserable question.

Why, my friends, economy should be considered, not only in this branch, but in every branch of the public service. It is not our money, but the people's money we are appropriating. There has been something said about the city letter carriers—that their salaries were too high or too low, that they should be placed upon the contract system if it is a good one. Is that any argument against this proposition? Admit, for the sake of argument, that the salaries are too high—I do not know—and you want to reduce them. Is that any reason why you should vote against this proposition? None at all. You might bring any question before this House and when you undertook to consider it some member would be able to rise in his place and point out some other reform equally necessary in the public service. Now, Mr. Chairman, I take the position that you can secure just as good service under this system as any other, as the present system, and it will not have many of the objections which can be urged against the present system, if continued.

How do you get your letter carriers under the present system and what are their qualifications? What is required? They must be able to read and write. What other qualification? Their character and reputation must be investigated. It does not say that it is necessary that their character and reputation should be good, but investigated and reported on, and I take it that generally men of good reputation would be required. They must be physically able to perform the service; they must have the equipments or be able to get them to do the work. There are the qualifications, and how do you ascertain these qualifications? You get them all through the investigation and conclusions of a route inspector who is sent upon the ground, except the examining board has the privilege of examining the handwriting and the spelling of the applicants. All else is but the conclusions of the man who examines the applicant and who may often be controlled by partisanship. Now what? Under the appointive system you get a man who can read and write. Under the contract system you get a man who can read and write. Under the appointive system you are supposed to get a man with a good moral character; under the contract system none but men who are trustworthy and reliable.

The carrier under the contract system must be physically able, must be qualified and have the means by which he can carry on this work, and must do the service himself. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] wasted a good deal of time in trying to convince this House that under the contract system a man might get the contract who had a lame mule and a broken cart. Why, under the appointive system you may not only get a carrier with a lame mule, but you may get one who has no mule and no cart at all. That is as likely to happen in the one case as in the other. So I repeat that this bill provides that the man who is to carry the mail under the contract system shall have the same and all the qualifications required under the appointive system. And the Post-Office Department can adopt regulations for ascertaining these qualifications just as thoroughly in the one case as the other.

But, Mr. Chairman, the point is made that the Postmaster-General, under the contract system, has the power to reject any and all bids. That is certainly a wise provision. It is contained in the provision for public letting of nearly all contracts, that the board or committee or authority letting the contract shall have this right. This provision will enable the Government to protect itself where all bids are unreasonably high and to protect the patrons against incompetent carriers.

Others see danger in the contract system because the route is to be let to the lowest bidder. It does not have to be let to the lowest bidder unless he has all the necessary qualifications to perform the service. You would imagine from the arguments of gentlemen on the other side that if the contract system should be adopted the Post-Office Department will take no further interest in the service. We have a right to suppose that the Postmaster-General will adopt the wisest and best regulations possible to govern the letting of these contracts and the performance of the service, and it will be just as easy for him to protect the patrons of the route against incompetent carriers under the contract system as the other. He can provide terms and conditions in the contract to protect the patrons from incompetent service. The bill requires the carrier under the contract system to give a good bond that he will do just what his contract requires him to do.

But they say you will have just as much politics in the one case as in the other. I refer to politics, Mr. Chairman, not simply because of its effect upon one party or the other, but because of its effect upon the question of good government. It has been suggested to me by a few Democrats that it might not be well to discuss the political features of the question; that we would lose votes on the other side of this House by it. Mr. Chairman, I credit gentlemen on the other side with sufficient intelligence to see the partisan advantage, the temporary advantage, at least, which they will secure in case this bill is defeated.

Now, let us see. I do not wish and have not time to go into any great detail. I want to state here as a general proposition that when an Administration, whether Democratic or Republican, has used partisanship in the administration of public affairs, it is an evidence that it will continue to do so wherever there is an opportunity and the occasion requires it. When I use the word "Republican" to-day, I use it because the Republicans are in power. If the Democrats were in control of the Administration I would use the word "Democrat" where I now use the word "Republican."

Now, let us see. They say it can have no effect. How is a man appointed? As shown by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]—and for that reason I will not go into the question at great length—the civil-service rules adopted leave it all to one man, who goes upon the ground, the route inspector or agent. He may be a very strong partisan, and his opinions and conclusion form the bulk of the evidence that goes before the examining board. Under the appointive system you can put into office men of no better qualifications, simply on the ground that they are good partisans.

But you say when they get in we will clothe them with such civil-service rules that they will not be able to accomplish anything in politics. Let us see. Suppose you get a hundred or two hundred of them in every Congressional district in the United States—and I understand some members have over a hundred to-day. Suppose you have enough to visit every voter in your district. We will say the Republicans are in control, and they have the sympathy and aid of this partisan machine. How will it work? Suppose some Democrat who is trying to carry a close district commences to correspond with conservative Republicans in the district and to send them public documents in order to win them over to his cause. The carriers know who the conservative Republicans and conservative Democrats are in these close districts and are able to poll them, and it will not be twenty-four hours before the facts will be reported to that political organization with which carriers are in sympathy. Can you prove what they are doing? No. They can make these reports in a way that they will never be detected.

Mr. KLUTTZ. How will the carrier know whom the letter is from?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Well, if it came from you, I imagine he would know pretty well.

Mr. KLUTTZ. I certainly would not use a franked envelope for that political communication.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. No; but if you were in Washington sending out documents under your own frank or writing personal letters bearing the Washington postmark, and your opponent was in your district, it would be a very stupid carrier if he did not soon learn that these documents and communications addressed to these conservative Republicans were coming from you.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Not unless he uses the franked envelope for a political communication, which he has no right to do.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Oh, I do not claim he would frank political or personal letters. But the postmark on the letters and the franks on the documents would surely be evidence enough.

Mr. SIMS. You can use an envelope with "House of Representatives" on it and stamp it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I do not know how many members use envelopes without "House of Representatives" on them. I imagine not very many. And a great many members frequently use franked envelopes and put the stamp on the frank. I simply mention that as one case. Now, let me tell you again. Suppose a Republican carrier—and I would say a Democratic carrier if the machine was under Democratic control—suppose this Republican carrier, in delivering his mail, goes to one of the conservative Republicans to give him his letter, and he finds the Democratic candidate for Congress, or some friend of the Democratic candidate for Congress, there laboring with this conservative Republican to obtain his vote.

If he reported to headquarters, would you have any evidence of it? If he told his brother and his brother reported it, would you have any evidence of it? None whatever. It is not necessary that he should go and make political speeches; but he has influence, and can do work which would count more than all else, and work that he can so cover up that all the detectives of the civil service could not find it out. These men can make the most reliable poll of the district, of the county, and the State of any set of men you can find. Remember they are the men who are supposed to have the news from the county seats and the little towns, and when the farmers in the field see them coming how easy for them to ask how this candidate or how that candidate is running; and, without saying whom they are for, they can very easily find out whom the farmer is for or the patron of the route is for, and they can make as complete a poll as possible without the civil service knowing anything about it. Take it in conventions and primary elections, and I confine it to no party.

I do not say that members of this House would use that kind of a machine; but I say it is possible, and it would be one of the greatest influences ever built up in this country if the party in power was willing to make use of it. Take it, and I refer to the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] because he is leading the opposition to this bill, and I would not go by that distinguished gentleman, who is so popular in his district, and who would have so little occasion to make use of a political machine of this kind to keep himself in Congress. I refer to him simply because he is the leader on the other side. I might take the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS], a very amiable and very honest gentleman on the other side, who perhaps would not permit an organization of this kind to interfere with the conventions of his district. But suppose, sir, that with one hundred of these men—and it has been admitted by men who have opposed this bill that it was possible to use them in conventions and primary elections—you get your hundred men stationed over your district—I refer to the gentleman from Virginia, and cast no reflection upon him when I use his name for an illustration—but suppose he is in a hard contest for the nomination for Congress, and we will suppose these hundred letter carriers are anxious to see him win. They go to every voter in the district. They could make a complete poll for Mr. SWANSON in spite of civil-service regulations, and they might do many other things to aid Mr. SWANSON. They could report what the friends of his opponent were doing in every community. And as the day of the primary or convention drew near I can imagine how the farmers would inquire of these carriers as to how the race was going, and how these carriers would reply that they were under the civil service and could take no part in politics, but that judging from the way the people talked they were nearly all for SWANSON, and his opponent was not likely to carry his own county. A man of less popularity than Mr. SWANSON might have to make use of such a machine, and can not you see what an effective one it would be. It is no use to dwell upon this before men who are intelligent and reasonable. It can be used when once established, and I care not if it is said that the civil service will make better rules and make opportunities for partisanship less. I admit that they may do that, and they have the power to adopt rules which will make the opportunity for partisanship greater than those now in force. My theory is not to give them the opportunity at all, if it is possible to prevent it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I say, I might take any Republican the same way, if you permit this to go on; I care not how much civil service you put around it. I am going to say right here that the old man in the Department 60 years of age, without a son, without a brother, without a cousin, but who once lived in some Congressional district, whenever they undertake to put him out as incompetent, although he is under the civil service, there is enough pressure brought to bear to keep him in; and the same political pressure will be used to keep in the incompetent letter carrier who could not remain in under the contract system. The same pressure that is to-day used to keep in the incompetent man under the civil service, without much influence at home, will certainly be used to keep in those who have influence at home. It was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] and the same by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that these rural letter carriers getting $50 a month were not of sufficient ability to influence any votes. It is not the influencing of the votes, it is in the gathering up secretly of information and placing it in the hands of men who are capable of influencing votes that makes it a great partisan machine to be used at the desire of the man who has its sympathy. I speak from information absolutely reliable when I say that they have been used in some districts for political purposes; they have been used to distribute campaign documents even when they were not addressed. I care not what kind of rules you adopt, until the civil service can invent some machine by which they can extract all the partisanship from these men you may expect partisanship to some extent in every district as long as it runs on these lines.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In deciding this question, does my friend think we should decide it from a political standpoint as to what advantages one party or the other party may get, or from the standpoint of efficiency and the good of the service to the people?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I am glad the gentleman from Alabama asked me that question. I have endeavored to show, and if he will read this bill carefully he will see that it does show, that you can get just as competent men under the contract system, with the same qualifications, as you do under any other system.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But my friend does not answer the question. If my friend thinks so, he should vote that way. But does he think that the argument in deciding the question should be applied to the political side of it or to the business side?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. First of all, we want an efficient service, but if we can get it free from partisanship we should prefer to do so. I refer to the partisanship of the appointive system, not because it may injure one party and help another, but because I believe such a great partisan machine, to be used by Democrats in Congress to renominate themselves or whereby Republicans in Congress can renominate themselves, would certainly in time have a very injurious effect upon the public service, and I am sure the gentleman from Alabama can see the dangers it would lead to.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me an interruption?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I can not resist the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Suppose the carrier is employed under the contract system, as this bill provides. He must be taken out of the district and the neighborhood where his services are to be rendered. Will he not be the political roustabout or friend of some politician just as much as if he was employed under the present system?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Yes, he will be the political friend of somebody; but when you get him under the system of appointment you know where he will be. He is definite, he is certain; you do not have to guess at his partisanship. But let me say this to the gentleman, that when these contracts are let, in the presence of the bidders, as they may be, each bidder watching the action of the other and finally knowing the bid of the other, as well as his qualifications, under such public circumstances, if the Postmaster-General or his agent were to be influenced by political considerations where it would be so easily exposed and so easy to prove it, it would be much less frequent than when you have them secretly selected by a partisan agent in the closet of the civil-service board, under the influence of political pressure.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Then I will not undertake to convince the gentleman.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the carrier, under the contract system, not depending upon political influence for the continuance of his job, will not have the same inducement to become an active partisan as the appointee who obtained his job and is holding on to it perhaps through political influence.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just one moment. This examination is conducted in the neighborhood where the work is done. The agent reports the result, which is sent to the central board.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. What is the gentleman talking about?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am talking about the examination of those who desire to be carriers. This report is made by the gentleman who you say goes around and obtains information in regard to your reelection—and I hope you will be reelected.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I am not thinking of that. In order that my personal interest politically in this matter may be, so far as possible, eliminated, I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that by the grace of the Republican legislature of my State I have been placed in a district with 2,200 Republican majority, which they at least consider safe.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I still think you will come back if you do yourself justice by making proper effort.

Now, this agent makes his examination, which is entirely in writing. He sends the papers to the central board, consisting of two Democrats, two Republicans, and a lady who is presumed to be neutral. That board then passes on the matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Passes on what?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Passes on what the agent has done—sees whether he has done right. And then there is an appeal to the Civil Service Commission, presided over by Mr. Procter, whom the gentleman is better acquainted with than I am. The examination is all in writing; everybody can see it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I understand all that, but let me call the gentleman's attention to this point: If the route inspector is partisan enough to want to appoint a particular man, does not the gentleman from Tennessee know he will have enough sense to make up his papers in such a way as to give the applicant he desires appointed the best record before the central board? If you do not think the inspector can do that, you do not give him credit for very much intelligence.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has the gentleman read the regulations of the Civil Service Commission on this subject?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I have; and I have heard them promulgated here by the gentleman from Tennessee a number of times during the course of this debate.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then I have nothing more to say.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. But after all, as to everything but handwriting and orthography, it is all left to this route inspector, who may be a strong partisan and favor one applicant because of his politics. If you can get the partisanship out of him, I will admit your civil-service regulations may accomplish something.

The assumption that you get a better man to start with under the appointive system than under the contract system is without foundation. I concur with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who said that he would rather trust the Postmaster-General, holding a position of great responsibility and who will have the authority to adopt rules and regulations for securing good men in this service, to be nonpartisan in his course, than depend upon any partisan inspector who may be sent out. You say that the Department in any case must depend upon some officer to make the examination. That is true; but under the system of civil-service appointment, when a man is once in the service it is hardly possible to get rid of him, I care not how incompetent he may become.

Mr. THAYER. What assurance have you that this man who will pass upon the different bidders would not be just as much a partisan as the inspector who passes upon an applicant under the present system?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. My dear sir, that is just what I have been talking about. If there is an examination, it is a kind of ex parte examination; there may be no opportunity to see whether partisanship enters into the case at all. But in the case of a public letting to a contractor, the Democrats are watching the Republicans, and the Republicans watching the Democrats. The bidders are known in the community, and political influences could not control the letting of contracts without its being exposed; and the more likely partisanship is to be exposed, the less will it be used. And as a further answer, I want to say that such influences never have operated in connection with the contract system; and if such has never been the case, that is a splendid proof that it never will.

On the other hand, the selection under the present system is by a secret proceeding. Of course, the route agent does not report that the applicant is a politician—that he is a Republican or a Democrat. But he can satisfy himself as to the political record of the applicant; he can satisfy himself whether he is a good Republican, if such a one is desired, or a Democrat if a Democrat is desired. He can satisfy himself through inquiry what political influence the man can exert. Whether the selection is made upon the suggestion of a member of Congress or somebody else need not appear. No evidence need be left behind to show what has been done.

I admit that in the end you can tell that under the present system more Republicans have been named than Democrats; but what I undertake to say is that under the contract system, where things are carried on in an open way, where each side is watching the other, if there is any attempt to favor a Republican or a Democrat, the thing can be exposed. It is easier to secure evidence of partisanship if it should occur, and it is therefore not so likely to occur.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion right there?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Certainly; I am always glad to receive a suggestion from the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The suggestion is to this effect—that not only can the route inspector do what the gentleman from Illinois has said he can do, namely, consult outside parties in making up his mind whom to recommend, but it is made his duty to do that under these very instructions, because one clause says that in addition to the references furnished by the applicant it shall be his duty to confer with two or three other prominent citizens not mentioned, so that he could make the Republicans referees in a Democratic district or Democratic Congressmen referees in a Republican section.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Why should he not have the right to go to somebody not a friend of the applicant and inquire about it?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Because if he is allowed that sort of discretion to pick his men he will consult the vote and will be apt to pick men for the places who are his friends.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Does the gentleman think that an applicant will put down the name of anybody he was not sure would recommend him?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No; but he can go to others.

Mr. KLUTTZ. He might select just the one of all others that would not give a good character.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It might be, but there is your opportunity for partisanship.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Most gentlemen who have been in this House very long understand fairly well that any Administration, whether Democratic or Republican, is always glad to have some good friends on the other side in case of any defection in its own Administration. It has been so under some Democratic Administrations and the same under Republican Administrations. I have no doubt some Democrats would be favored, but who would they be? They would be those men who come from strong Democratic districts where the Republican Administration had no hope of electing their candidate. There they can afford to be liberal, and it is inconsistent with what has been done to say that they would not be. Now, of course this machine in such districts as that might not be used to control elections and it might not be used in convention. What I contend is that it can be used in conventions, and I believe it would be almost impossible for the Democratic members of this House who have such machines to prevent its use, however much they might desire or however anxious they might be to have it operate for the other candidate.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask the gentleman a question? How many carriers have been appointed in your district upon your recommendation?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. If there has been one appointed on my recommendation in my district I do not know anything about it.

Mr. LAMB. You ought to have had half of them.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I have not had a half or any other fraction that I know of; but I am not discussing that. But, while on that point, it is an admitted fact in this House that in strong Democratic districts, where the Administration has had no hopes of electing anybody, they have permitted the members to name a large number of these carriers; and whether those carriers will assist those members in securing their renominations I can not say. I want to see a great many of them returned.

But I do not want to see these great political machines built up in this way. I do not care whom they are to benefit or injure. And here is where I call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to a question which rises far above any political consideration in this case, and that is the building up of a great political or partisan machine throughout this country, as you will have in the future years, that can control the nominations and elections for Congress. Such a political organization may become so great as to control not only the election of Congressmen, but county, district, and State officers as well, and even the President.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I would like just a few moments more.

Mr. LOUD. How much?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I do not know that I will use fifteen minutes, but I would like to have that much.

Mr. LOUD. I will yield the gentleman fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for fifteen minutes longer.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Now, as I said, Mr. Chairman, I feel that we have a right to speak perfectly plain upon these questions. I do not hope to secure the support of a single member on the other side of the aisle by convincing him that he will have as much partisan advantage under this bill, if a law, as under the present system; and the reason I say it is because I know in the first place he is intelligent enough to see it without any explanation from this side of the House. My hope for the passage of this bill is that there are many members on the other side of the House who are so conscientious in the discharge of their public duties here that in the face of these partisan advantages they will rise above such party considerations and for the purpose of serving well their country now and for years to come, cast their votes for this bill.

Mr. Chairman, it has been said that if these rural carriers are appointed they can become such a great organization that when they meet and pass their resolutions in favor of increasing their salaries the members of this House can not resist them. The answer is made that this will have no effect on members, and it is really amusing to hear some of the opponents of this bill describe in exaggerated terms the superior honesty and courage of a Congressman and show how boldly he can resist all such political influences; how he can stand up and resist the great machine in his district that has his political destiny in its hands. There may be a few such men; but I am afraid the most of them have died and gone to their reward. There are few men in this House—and it is no news for you for me to say so—but what are to some extent controlled by such influences. It has been done in the past, and it will be done as long as Congress continues to meet. And I say if we can avoid building up this great partisan or political machine to control conventions in the interest of one Democrat against another; to control Republican conventions in a Republican district in favor of one Republican against another; to control the election of Congressmen in close districts, whether the Democratic party or the Republican party be in power; if we can do anything to avoid that, and yet retain just as good service for the people, I say we ought to do it.

I am as anxious as any man in this House to give the farmers of this country just as good rural free delivery as possible. I understand its influence. I know something of the blessings and the comforts that it will bring to every household in the country by giving them their daily mail at their doors; but I want to say to you that no man knows better what it is worth to carry the mail over a certain route than the man who is intelligent and honest and capable, and who lives upon the route and has gone over it. Rest assured that such a man has intelligence enough to take care of himself in the bid when he applies for the contract.

I want to say to those members whose constituents have suffered so much from some of the afflictions of a bad system of star routes—that in my judgment there is no comparison between this system and that. Under the old star-route system a man could take any number of contracts, having no interest in the people, and then go into a community where he had no care for anybody and select the man who would do the work the cheapest, without regard to what kind of service he rendered or whether he ever got his pay.

Under that system you were helpless, you were without any remedy; but under this system provided in this bill it is not the speculator who is doing business with the contractor. The Government contracts directly with the carrier; has just as efficient a man there to supervise the service and look after the interests of the people, under the contract system as it would have under the other. The contract is to be awarded, not to the lowest bidder, unless he be qualified, but to the man who is capable, the man who has every qualification enumerated in the civil-service rules.

If this man fails to give you good service, with the Post-Office Department supervising his action, do you not know that the Post-Office Department can provide in its contracts and regulations against any failure under such a system as this?

And there is one suggestion that I want to make right here to the members of this House. It has been said, "Let this system go on and let the Bureau experiment with the contract system." Why, my friends, if you let this go on you will find it very difficult in a short time to make any change. If you adopt the contract system now and try it for one year and it does not work satisfactorily, you will have the power to come here and change it. There will be no lobby; there will be no influence at home threatening defeat for your action. But if you permit this to go on for a few years under the present system—and it is said to-day that some members now have a hundred of these useful men in their districts who might aid them in their elections and in their conventions—if you let it go on a few years longer you will find it a great deal more difficult to change from the appointive to the contract system than you would to change from the contract system to the appointive system if the contract system should fail.

Now, while I have no complaint to make against those who feel that it is their duty to vote against this bill—I know many of them have very strong reasons which they consider sufficient in their own minds—I want to say right here, as I said before, this is a time when we can afford to speak plainly. I want to say to those coming from strong Democratic districts that while you have as good a right to follow your judgment as I have to follow mine, I feel that I have the right to suggest to you here and now consequences which I consider reasonably sure to occur in case this system is continued. I know it becomes possible to use it in elections. I do not say they will. I simply declare that you are building up one of the greatest political machines that ever existed in this country.

You say that he is under the civil service. How can the civil service follow the rural carrier through his route where the houses are perhaps a quarter or half a mile or a mile apart? Do you tell me that they can follow him with the same watchful eye as they superintend your clerks in the great bureaus they are conducting? You know it is impossible. In my judgment, when you vote down this bill, when you vote to continue this great and growing system, filling these positions through political influences, you are by your votes surrendering every doubtful district in this Union to the party in power, if they see fit to use the machinery which you are now about to place in their hands.

It is because I believe you will get just as good service under the contract system, placed as it will be under the control and supervision of the Post-Office Department, and at the same time take it out of politics, that I favor it. It is because I believe that if we are to have rural free delivery, the farmers of every community are entitled to it if they want it, and the cheaper you can make it the sooner you can spread its blessings among all the farmers, for its growth and development will depend to some extent upon its cost; and while the farmers want it and are entitled to it, they understand that a large portion of its expense must be paid by them after all, as well as a large share of the expenses of every other branch of public service. Therefore, they want it at a reasonable cost.

I close, Mr. Chairman, by warning both Republicans and Democrats against establishing a great political machine which I believe could be used for political and partisan purposes in this country and to interfere with the free choice of the people in the nomination and election of their candidates.

I mention this not because of the effect that it might have upon this political party or that, but because of the very injurious effect it would have on the public service.

One word more. I want to say that in my district I know of counties where it will take two or three times as much to provide and maintain the necessary vehicles for carrying the mail over a route of the same distance as it would in others. Then, when you take it throughout the country, you see how impossible it is to equalize the salaries; but rest assured they will be fixed according to the work of the most difficult route, and those who are getting the lowest salaries will make continual contention to have their salaries increased to the highest. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOUD. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SPIGHT].

Mr. SPIGHT. Mr. Chairman, the question of rural free delivery of mails is one that intimately concerns that class of our citizenship which deserves most and receives less of the benefits of Government than any other class. The millions of farmers who contribute so much to our commercial greatness, and feed and clothe so large a percentage of the world's population, have never been accorded that consideration to which they are entitled.

The fruits of their labors are not guarded by any policy of protection such as is accorded to manufacturers and those engaged in other industries, but while they bear so large a share of the burdens of the Government they are systematically robbed to make the so-called "great captains of industry" richer day by day. It is this class of wealth producers that is intended to be benefited by rural free delivery. The system was inaugurated as an experiment, but its rapid growth and development have carried it beyond the experimental stage, and it may now be regarded as one of our fixed institutions. Ours has never been a government of retrogression, and the time will never come when a system so beneficial to the masses of the people as rural free delivery will be abandoned.

This being true, there are three important considerations which should command our attention and earnest efforts:

First. We should endeavor to make it as helpful as possible to our great rural population;

Second. We should make the service as efficient as possible; and Third. We should make it as cheap as possible compatible with good service.

I believe the bill now under consideration has a tendency to meet all three of these conditions, and for that reason it has my support. Under the present system and the rulings of the Department, in many localities, and especially in the South, it is difficult to get a free-delivery route established, because it must be not less than 20 or 25 miles going and returning and not less than 100 families must be served on the route. Not 100 people, but 100 families, which would mean ordinarily not less than 500 of population.

If this ruling of the Department should be adhered to, comparatively few Southern communities would ever get the benefit of it. We have not the dense population of the Northern and Eastern and many of the Western States. While such States as Illinois, Indiana, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania have a great number of these free-delivery routes, Mississippi, Louisiana, and some other Southern States are practically without any, although we contribute our full share toward the support of the system in other parts of the country.

Under the bill which we are now considering, it is made possible and probable that shorter routes may be established, serving a less population than under the system as it now exists, because if the contract system for the employment of carriers as proposed by this bill should be adopted, every carrier will be paid, not a stated salary of $600 a year as now provided, but a contract price to be fixed according to the service rendered and the distance traveled, and in this way the number of routes would be multiplied and the number of families receiving the benefits of free delivery greatly increased.

On the second proposition—the efficiency of the service—the opponents of this bill make their most serious argument, contending that under the proposed legislation a less efficient class of carriers will be employed than under the present methods of the Post-Office Department. They say that shiftless, worthless fellows, who will have no interest in the service but to draw their pay, will underbid better men and thus secure the contracts. But let us examine that feature and see what there is in it. On the second page of the bill, commencing on the nineteenth line, we find certain safeguards against the possible occurrence of such a state of affairs as is predicted by those who oppose this bill.

First. The contract shall not go, necessarily, to the lowest bidder, but to the—lowest bidder who can furnish satisfactory evidence to the Postmaster-General that such bidder is a legal and actual resident of the district or territory in which the proposed service is to be performed—

He must live on the route over which he is to travel, and will therefore be known to the people he is to serve.

Second. He must satisfy the Postmaster-General—that he is a reliable and trustworthy person, of good moral character, able to read and write, and having sufficient intelligence and ability to properly perform the service, and who shall tender sufficient guaranties that he will personally perform acceptable service."

Now, what stronger safeguards can be thrown around the service than are embodied in these provisions? There is certainly just as little danger of incompetent and unworthy men getting in under the proposed law as there is under the present system of appointment, and there is the further advantage of having these selections removed from the domain of partisan politics. There is, in the proposed law, the further provision that no one "shall be awarded a contract for more than one route." So there can be no chance that one man may take a number of contracts and sublet them at starvation rates, while the contractor who does really nothing gets all the profits, as has so often been the case in star route mail contracts.

Under this bill the contractor can have but one route. He must live on that; he must be reliable, of good moral character, able to read and write, of sufficient intelligence to do the work; and he must give bond that he will do the work himself and do it acceptably. The minority of the committee say in their report that contractors under the proposed law would not try to please and accommodate the people, but would equip themselves indifferently and have no care but to do "the least possible service for the compensation received." I see no force whatever in this argument, because such a contractor, if he should have sense enough to take care of himself and "keep out of the fire," would know that if he should adopt that policy he would receive notice that at the end of thirty days his contract would be annulled and he would be out of a job. Even though he should be inclined to neglect his duties, the principle of self-preservation would compel him to a different course.

My third proposition is as to the comparative cost. Upon this I have not a doubt that the average cost per route would be less under this bill than under the present system. Let us examine for a moment the rapid increase of salaries under the present system. When it was first inaugurated the salary was fixed at $300 a year, and there was no trouble in getting the service at that compensation. Then the carriers asked for $400 and got it. Then for $500 and got it. Now, it has been increased to $600 and they are still asking for more, and if the present system prevails it will soon reach $1,000.

It has been stated that there are now about 8,000 of these carriers, and that within five years the number will be increased to 50,000, and it is safe to say that within the same time the salary to the carrier, under the present system, will be increased to $1,000, so that this branch of the postal service alone would cost the country the enormous sum of $50,000,000 a year. I want to see this service extended until every country community which desires it, and can comply with the conditions, shall have the benefit of it, but I do not want to see it crushed under its own weight.

I believe that under the contract system proposed by this bill, and which can be amended from time to time as experience may suggest, the average cost to the Government will not exceed $500 per route, and that many shorter routes will be established, thus bringing the benefits to a great many communities that can never be reached under the present system.

The political bearing has been discussed from various standpoints, but it has been made quite clear that many who oppose this bill are largely influenced, perhaps unconsciously, by a desire to retain the patronage they now enjoy—the right to name these carriers in their respective districts. The good of the service ought to be the highest and the sole consideration prompting the action of a representative of the people. It has also been demonstrated that under the present system partisan politics has largely controlled in making thes appointments, and the hollow pretense of placing it under the civil-service rules will not mend matters.

The whole question is practically committed to the hands of the route inspector under the new rules which went into effect on the 1st of February of this year. In the twelfth article of these new instructions, as to the examination and selection of applicants for carrier by the route inspector, it is declared that—

> After an examination has been held the route inspector will carefully observe the general characteristics of the candidates or applicants, taking special notice of health and physical conditions, and in submitting his report state which, in his judgment, should be selected.

This makes the inspector not only a judge of the business qualifications, but also of the health and physical conditions of the applicants, and gives to this insignificant subordinate all the power he may want in the exercise of his personal and political preferences.

There is another clause in this same article which, if it is expected that it shall be enforced, gives but little comfort to members of Congress who think they will have the right to name carriers. It provides that "no political indorsements must be received or entertained." I suspect that this provision is mere political claptrap and means nothing, and gentlemen who oppose the pending bill on the idea that they wish to retain the right, if they now have it accorded to them, of naming carriers in their districts, say by their action that they do not expect that provision to be carried out in good faith. Of course we know that practically all of these route inspectors will be Republicans and they will naturally incline to applicants of the same political faith. Like my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi], I would rather risk the Postmaster-General in his high and honorable station than these little one-horse inspectors, many of whom may have neither sense of personal responsibility nor weight of character to lose.

Some Southern gentlemen have expressed apprehension that under this bill we might have negro carriers. I have no fear on this ground. I do not think that there is as much danger of this occurring under the pending bill as under the present system. The average Southern country negro does not bother himself much about mails, and has little capacity for official station and less for making bonds for the performance of contracts with penalties affixed, and, added to these, his well-known undesirability as an official dealing with the business affairs of the white people will practically eliminate him from these contests, even though the Post-Office Department should encourage him in the effort, which I do not believe will be done. Nor do I believe that there is anything in the position taken by the opponents of this bill that, under its provisions, men less competent or less efficient will be secured than under the present system.

As I have already said, before any contract will be awarded to any bidder he must satisfy the Postmaster-General—not a mere underling—that he possesses all the requisite qualifications for the service. And the charge that the head of one of the greatest Departments of the Government has less of personal integrity and more of political partisanship than an obscure route inspector dangerously "clothed with a little brief authority" is unworthy of the men who bring it and an insult to the National Administration. Under the present system this little route inspector is the "whole thing," while under the bill before us the head of the great Post-Office Department is the final arbiter. As between the two, I do not see how men who look alone to the good of the service and the best interests of the whole country can hesitate for a moment.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that one of the weakest of the many weak arguments made against this bill is that a contractor may deliver the mails until bad weather sets in and then quit, to the great inconvenience of the people on the route. Do gentlemen forget that before the contract is awarded to him he must enter into bond, payable to the United States, conditioned that he will faithfully perform the service required of him? Do gentlemen believe that the Government would tolerate a capricious, or corrupt, or unnecessary withdrawal without holding his bond liable for the default? His obligation to continue the service for the full time covered by his contract is even more binding than under the present system, which provides that "a letter carrier who resigns will not be permitted to discontinue service until his successor is appointed and qualifies."

Another fallacy in this argument is that the carrier who has a contract will want to "lay down his job" because of two or three winter months in which there will be some cold or rainy days, when by holding on he can have steady and profitable employment during the other nine or ten months in the year of pleasant weather, leaving out of consideration the obligation of his bond and the liability of his friends who signed with him.

I favored this bill when I first read it, and the weakness of the arguments against it have only confirmed me in my first convictions. I should much prefer that the bill be amended so as, after reasonable notice from the Department, the present carriers should also be put under the contract system, but believing that this will soon be done anyhow and the inequalities removed, I shall support the bill even without the amendment.

I have the honor to represent an agricultural district composed of as noble a people as the sun shines upon anywhere, and nothing which the Government can give is too good for them. I try to represent their interests and not the interests of a few mail carriers and contractors. While I would enjoy the privilege, if it should ever be given to me under the present system or any other, of appointing my friends to these places as mail carriers, I can not conceive that I have the moral right to make the interests of the great masses of the people subservient to my ambition to gratify a few friends and advance my own political fortunes.

I love my friends as devotedly as any man can, and gratitude is a part of my religion. An ungrateful man is, in my estimation, one of the meanest and most contemptible characters God ever permitted to curse the world with his presence. There is no fit place for him on earth; there is no room for him in heaven. But under my sense of moral and legal obligation I have no right to trifle with the sacred trust reposed in me by nearly 200,000 people to enable me to dispense some small favors to a few friends.

I believe this bill is right in principle and correct in policy from the standpoint of the best interests of the people, and I shall cheerfully vote for it.

Mr. Chairman, I will append to my remarks some extracts from the rules of the Department as to how rural free-delivery routes may be established, and with this I conclude, thanking the House for the courtesy with which they have listened to me. [Loud applause.]

The extracts referred to are as follows:

HOW TO OBTAIN RURAL FREE DELIVERY.

Present a petition, addressed to the First Assistant Postmaster-General, Rural Free Delivery Division. This petition should be signed only by heads of families, and should mention the number in each family over 16 years of age. It should set forth the nature of the country where the delivery is desired, whether densely or sparsely populated, the principal occupations of the people, the character of the roads, and the distances which, under existing conditions, each person has to travel to receive his mail, and should be accompanied by a map or plat indicating the route or routes proposed.

The petition should read something like this:

[Form of petition.]

To the FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned heads of families, residing in —— County, State of ——, respectfully ask that the rural free-delivery service be extended to them, the delivery to start from —— post-office, —— County, —— State, or such other point as the officers of the Department may deem best adapted for the service. A map or rough sketch of the proposed route is herewith inclosed. Your petitioners are mostly (here state occupations, such as farmers, truck gardeners, dairymen, cattle raisers, or whatever the chief occupation of the people may be). The roads over the proposed route are (state whether pike, graveled, or otherwise).

There are no unbridged creeks, and the roads are passable at all seasons of the year.

We agree to conform to the official regulations governing the service and to erect boxes which have been approved by the Department for the reception of our mail.

* * * * * * *

This petition, when properly signed, should be sent to the Representative in Congress, or to one of the Senators, with a request that he indorse thereon his recommendation of the service asked and forward the petition to the Department.

* * * * * * *

The route should be so arranged that the carrier will not be required to travel over the same ground twice on the same day.

Those desiring the delivery must hereafter be prepared to put up, at their own expense, appropriate and secure boxes in accordance with the orders of the Department.

The prices of these boxes range from $1 up to a little over $3, including locks.

When a rural free-delivery route has been equipped with boxes of the above-named description the Department will consider these boxes as entitled to the protection of the United States Statutes, which provide severe penalties for willful or malicious injury to or interference with the contents of any receptacles for the United States mails established by authority of the Postmaster-General.

HOW SERVICE IS ESTABLISHED.

Upon receipt of a petition, favorably indorsed by a Representative in Congress, the Department refers the papers to the special agent in charge of the division which includes the State in which the petition originates. He assigns a special agent to visit the location indicated, to lay out a route or routes, and to select rural carriers, to be appointed by the Department. In such cases the advice of the Representative in Congress is sought as regards the carriers to be appointed and in respect to other postal service which may have to be discontinued on the establishment of rural free delivery.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11728 and had come to no resolution thereon.

He also presented petitions of Bricklayers and Plasterers' Local Union No. 18, of Elizabeth; of Boiler Makers and Shipbuilders' Local Union No. 16, of Elizabeth, and of Journeymen Bricklayers' Local Union No. 7, of Camden, all in the State of New Jersey, praying for the reenactment of the Chinese-exclusion law; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. HEITFELD presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Genesee, Idaho, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the sale and disposal of lands held by Indian heirs; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DUBOIS. I present a petition of the American Chamber of Commerce, of Manila, praying for the enactment of laws allowing cooly labor to enter the Philippine Islands under such restrictions and laws as the Philippine Commission may from time to time enact. I think that almost every Senator has received one of these petitions, and I should like to have it read.

There being no objection, the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on the Philippines, as follows:

The American Chamber of Commerce, of Manila. An appeal to Congress for the enactment of laws allowing cooly labor to enter the Philippine Islands under such restrictions and laws as the Philippine Commission may from time to time enact.

To the Congress of the United States of America:

The American Chamber of Commerce, of Manila, P. I., respectfully represents to your honorable body that by authority and under instruction of resolution adopted at a full meeting of this chamber held on the 3d day of January this chamber does petition and earnestly request the enactment of laws by Congress allowing cooly labor to enter the Philippine Islands under such restrictions and laws as the Philippine Commission may from time to time enact.

The present restrictive law does not benefit the Filipinos, nor is it of benefit to anyone. This labor will not enter into competition with American labor, and its entry into the Philippine Islands is imperatively needed.

Tobacco, hemp, and sugar plantations are only partially cultivated by reason of insufficiency of manual laborers. There are at present people in the city of Manila who came here for the purpose of investing in plantations, and to cultivate them upon lines in advance of the primitive ideas now in vogue. Investors are compelled to either leave these islands or await such time as laborers can be secured. This being the situation at present, without this legislation the Philippine Islands can not be properly developed.

Building in the city of Manila has been retarded for months, and only since the quarantine has been raised and those Chinese entitled to land have returned to these islands has building actively revived.

For the development of these islands, the urgent necessity for the immediate enactment of such laws can not be placed too strongly before Congress. For which relief this chamber, composed of American citizens, representing the commercial interests of the Philippines, does most respectfully pray.

F. E. GREEN, President.
ROGER AP C. JONES, Secretary.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of Local Division No. 2, Order of Railroad Telegraphers, of St. Louis, Mo., praying for the passage of the so-called Hoar anti-injunction bill, to limit the meaning of the word "conspiracy" and the use of "restraining orders and injunctions" in certain cases; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TELLER. I present a memorial of the legislature of Colorado, praying for the maintenance of the present tariff on foreign sugar, and remonstrating against reciprocity with Cuba. I ask that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance. I suppose it ought to be inserted in the RECORD, as that is the usual custom with memorials of State legislatures.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial No. 1.—By Mr. Madden, of Weld.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Your memorialists, the legislature of the State of Colorado, in extra session assembled, respectfully represent as follows:

The beet-sugar product of the State of Colorado was—

In 1899	$100,000
In 1900	1,125,000
In 1901	3,600,000
And will be in 1902, approximately	6,000,000

There are now six factories in existence within the borders of this State, which have been erected at the expense of nearly $3,000,000. The operations of these factories have been the result of diversifying our industries, enlarging the area of irrigated lands, multiplying homes, and reducing the cost of sugar throughout the trans-Missouri country. We expect a production of sugar aggregating a value of $10,000,000 during the year 1903. The soil of the arid West has proven eminently adapted to the production of beet sugar, every year witnessing an increase in saccharine matter and a greater purity of the product.

Considering, then, that according to the report of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department, the imports from foreign countries for 1901 amounted to 4,500,000,000 of pounds of sugar, valued at $115,000,000, of which more than 4,000,000,000 pounds, or fully 85 per cent, came from the Tropics, where it was produced by "coolie" labor, and the remainder from the bounty-fed fields and factories of Europe, we beg to point out that our people should not be deprived of this opportunity to employ their labor and to dispose of their product within their own markets.

When it is known that Cuba imported into the United States during 1901 1,200,000,000 pounds, or fully 30 per cent of the cane sugar which entered our ports, deriving therefrom an estimated revenue of over $30,000,000, it may appear reasonable that the people of the West should be allowed an equal chance with them; and that is what the difference in labor in Cuba and Colorado, added to the tariff, amounts to.

The beet-sugar industry of Europe is being fostered by the Government. What we desire is a continuance of the legally established protection against the unfair fiscal arrangements of Europe, and against unjust competition in labor on the part of Cuba and other tropical countries.

We, therefore, respectfully show to your honorable bodies:

First. That the beet-sugar industry has been established upon the lands, formerly arid, reclaimed by the labor of the Western people in reliance upon the protection afforded by the present tariff.

Second. That the further development of this industry depends upon the perpetuation of the conditions created by said tariff.

Third. That the free admission of cane sugar raised within the borders of tropical lands now belonging to the United States has narrowed the market of this industry to the interior States, and that any reduction of the duties imposed by said tariff in favor of other tropical countries not belonging to the Union will be likely to destroy the beet-sugar industry of this and other Western States.

Fourth. That the beet sugar as promoted and encouraged by our present tariff law is the first and only industry in the West in which the farmers and producers are directly interested which has received the benefit of the American policy of protection, which policy should therefore be continued until its benefits have been enjoyed by the West equally with the East.

Fifth. That for these reasons we ask the maintenance of the present tariff rates.

And your memoralists will ever pray.

D. C. COATES,
President of the Senate.
W. H. KELLEY,
Secretary of the Senate.
B. F. MONTGOMERY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
WILLIAM J. HAMILTON,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Approved this 1st day of March, A. D. 1902, at 4.20 o'clock p. m.

JAMES B. ORMAN,
Governor of the State.
DAVID A. MILLS,
Secretary of State.
